THE REPORT OF THE COMMISSION ON ECCLESIASTICAL DISCIPLINE.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (THE MARQUESS OF RIPON): My Lords, your Lordships no doubt observed that Lord Kinnaird, who had given notice yesterday to ask His Majesty's Government—

> 1. If they can explain to the House the cause of the repeated delays in presenting the Report of the Commission on Ecclesiastical Discipline to His Majesty the King, and why it has not been presented before Whitsuntide as promised in March in another place;
>
> 2. Would the Government endeavour to hasten this Report, as it would be of the greatest value during the Education debate.
>
> 3. Does not the prolonged delay involve the Government in considerable additional expense;
>
> 4. Could the Government also further the matter by recommending to the Commission the advisability of getting the volumes of evidence or some of them printed off and bound at once, so that there will be no printing delays after the Commission have made their report—was not in his place to put the Questions. I have since received a letter from him stating the cause of his absence, and I think it would be only fair to the noble Lord to read his letter to your Lordships, as some Members of the House, at all events, complained a good deal of his not being in his place. Lord Kinnaird writes—

> "I must apologise for not arriving in time to put my Questions this afternoon. I was unavoidably detained and hurried down to the House, but found I was just too late. I was taking part in the jubilee meeting of a society of which I am treasurer. I thought I was safe if I arrived by ten minutes to five. I also got blocked in Bond Street."

I understand from the noble Lord that he is going to put his Questions down for Friday next. I am glad that he proposes taking an early opportunity of doing so, as the Questions tend to reflect, I think unreasonably, upon a Royal Commission, and I do not think it is a matter which ought to be delayed.

COLONIAL MARRIAGES BILL [H.L.].

Read 3^a (according to order), and passed and sent to the Commons.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF STAMFORD: My Lords, this is an extremely simple Bill, and it will need only a very few words of explanation. In the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, it is laid down that a person shall be disqualified from being elected and being a municipal councillor if, and while, among other disqualifications, he has directly or indirectly, by himself or his partners, any share or interest in any contract or employment, with, by, or on behalf of the council. Then follows this qualification, that he shall not be so disqualified or be deemed to have any share or interest in such a contract or employment by reason of his having any share or interest in, inter alia—

> "Any railway company, or any company incorporated by Act of Parliament, or Royal Charter, or under the Companies Act of 1862."

It is proposed to amend this last section by the addition of the words—

> "Or any society registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Acts, 1893 and 1895."

As things are at present, if a member of such a society has a seat on a municipal council, and that council enters into a contract with the society of which such person is a member, it is held that he is disqualified for being a councillor. I think your Lordships will acknowledge that this is a matter which should be remedied. It is merely sought to place a member of such a society on the same footing as a shareholder in a joint stock company; or, in other words, to place a man who may be described as a small member of a large society on the same footing as a large shareholder of a small company. The question is one of some importance at the present day, although it was a small matter at the time when the Municipal Corporations Act was amended in 1882. The figures in the last report of the Chief Registrar of Industrial and Provident Societies shows that there were, in 1904, 1,485 such societies in England and Wales, with a membership of 1,787,602, and the sales of the societies amounted to £71,153,459. These societies have increased very rapidly of late years, and are conducting important businesses, and I hope your Lordships will agree to the proposal contained in this Bill to remove what is felt to be a great inequality.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."—(The Earl of Stamford.)

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE AND FISHERIES (Earl CARRINGTON): My Lords, there is no doubt whatever that the law should be made uniform in this respect, and my right hon. friend the President desires me to say that he sees no objection to this Bill, which he looks upon as a very useful and practical measure.

On Question, Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

METROPOLITAN POLICE COMMISSION BILL.

[THIRD READING.]

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^a."—(Earl Beauchamp.)

EARL RUSSELL, who had given notice to move to resolve "That in the opinion of this House the proposed inquiry is of too limited a character to serve any useful purpose," said: My Lords, your Lordships will recollect what took place on the Second Reading of this Bill, the print of which only reached the House at the moment when the Second Reading was being moved; and the circumstances which compelled me, therefore, to defer my observations upon it until this stage. The objection to this Bill presents considerable difficulty, because it is impossible to amend the portion to which I invite your Lordships to take exception—that is, the terms of reference to the Royal Commission. These are contained in the recital of the Bill, and it is therefore impossible to put down an Amendment. The terms of reference in the Bill are as follows—

> "To inquire into and report upon the duties of the Metropolitan Police in dealing with cases of drunkenness, disorder, and solicitation in the streets, and the manner in which those duties are discharged, with power to make recommendations thereon."

From the time that this matter first arose objection has been taken in both Houses to the limited nature of the reference, and I would call your Lordships' attention for one moment to the class of cases which the reference will exclude from the consideration of the Royal Commission.

One of those cases must be fairly well known to you Lordships. I refer to the case of Police-constable Rolls, who was sentenced to a long term of penal servitude for perjury. There are many people who have taken the view from the beginning that the trial of that police-constable was conducted in an unsatisfactory manner, and that he did not in fact receive justice. In connection with this very Bill I find an article in one of this morning's newspapers dealing with the case of Rolls, in which the following is said—

> "The release of ex-Police-constable Rolls does not signify pardon or legal rehabilitation, but it certainly mitigates what we believe to be a wholly unmerited tragedy. This man has never had a fair trial, nor will the police officials permit the Home Secretary to allow the case to be publicly inquired into."

Your Lordships may recollect that the accusation against this constable was that he took a prisoner to the station, and in the course of searching the prisoner at the station foisted upon him and professed to have found on his person a hammer and some other instruments intended for housebreaking; the evidence against him was that of the person so arrested, a man of unfixed home, and of a woman of the lowest class, who was not introduced until late in the proceedings, and whose evidence has always been regarded by a large number of persons as unsatisfactory and unreliable. The newspaper article proceeds—

> "The way in which this girl was summoned to Scotland Yard and there subjected to solitary cross-examination is not more strange than the determined effort to prevent the case, at all costs, from coming before the Royal Commission, which is thus reduced to a rather palpable farce."

There are other cases with which your Lordships may not be so familiar, but all of the same character, dealing with arrests by the police and with what is believed to be mistaken, and, in some cases, manufactured, police evidence to justify the police if a mistake had been made.

There is the case, to which I may have to call your Lordships' attention again later, of a man named Croucher, who was sentenced to imprisonment for theft, a charge of which I believe it is now admitted he was innocent. That man was released, but was not compensated in any way for the injustice done him, and he has been convicted since of an assault upon the police in circumstances which made many people think there was no justification for that conviction. That being an assault on the police, it is doubtful whether it will be covered by the terms of reference to this Royal Commission, because the actual words are "drunkenness, disorder, and solicitation," yet that is one of the cases requiring investigation.

Then there is the case of a man named Scott. Scott was arrested on a charge of betting and convicted on the evidence of two detectives; he has subsequently done what he could to produce several witnesses—it is true he did not call them at his trial, though of that he gives an intelligible explanation—and to have his case reopened, but he has found that impossible. The magistrate has refused to grant process against the detectives who gave evidence against him, and that refusal on the part of the magistrate has been supported by the High Court on appeal. That is a case in which it is believed that the police have made an entire mistake and have given evidence which is not true. That case also cannot be investigated by the Commission.

I think it is not too much to say that in the other House there has been a very large and general discontent at the limitation of the terms of reference. It is not a real and genuine inquiry which it is proposed to hold by this Commission into the conduct of the police, and I have some apprehension, if further inquiry is necessary, as it most certainly is, that when that inquiry is demanded, we shall be met with the statement that a Royal Commission has been appointed and dealt with it. On the other hand, it is possible that the evidence which is brought before this Commission may be of such a character as to cause the public to demand that another inquiry on a larger scale should take place.

Is it, or is it not, desired by His Majesty's Government to get at the truth in this matter, and to sift these cases thoroughly? I ask that in view of communications which I have myself had with the Home Office in the course of preparing some evidence for this inquiry. The clerks' notes upon which these prisoners are convicted are in the custody of the magistrates. They are apparently not public documents to which the public is entitled on the payment of the necessary fee; but it is obvious that if any case where it is alleged that there has been miscarriage of justice is to be presented to the Royal Commission, even among the limited number of cases that do come within the terms of reference, it will be necessary for those who present it to see the magistrates' clerks' notes. I applied to the Home Office in the hope that authority would be given for those notes to be supplied, and in reply I received this letter on behalf of the Home Secretary—

> "Whitehall,
> "9*th June*, 1906.
>
> "MY LORD,—With reference to your application of the 29th ultimo that Mr. Timewell may be furnished with certain papers for use in connection with the preparation of evidence for submission to the Royal Commission on the Metropolitan Police, I have the honour, by direction of the Secretary of State, to say that he cannot direct magistrates to furnish copies of depositions or notes of evidence to Mr. Timewell. If the depositions or notes of the evidence in any case should be required by the Royal Commission the magistrates will no doubt be ready to supply them direct to the Commission.
>
> "ERNLEY BLACKWELL."

No doubt they will, but it is not possible to present a case so well if you are furnished with a portion of your evidence in the middle of the inquiry, and when there is a great deal of difficulty and delay in obtaining it. If it is desired that this should be a real inquiry, I submit that no obstacle should be placed in the way of preparing evidence to be laid before it. The impression is gaining ground that this is not intended to be a real inquiry, that it is not intended to be an inquiry as a result of which the police force shall be cleansed of the abuses that exist, but that it is merely an inquiry to whitewash the C. Division as a whole, or the particular constables concerned in one particular case which has been much discussed. In these circumstances it is hardly to be expected that the police witnesses who give evidence before the Commission will be frank or state fully everything that they know and everything that has been brought to their notice as to irregularities in the police force.

I desire it to be understood that I make no general charge against the police as a whole. Your Lordships, of course, come in contact with the police in a manner in which you find them extremely agreeable and useful servants of the public; but there is a section of the population, the poorest of the poor, whose club is the public-house and whose home is to a large extent the streets, who are practically at the mercy of the police, and who constantly suffer injustice on account of the conduct of certain police constables who have not sufficient regard for the responsibilities which their position casts upon them. Those are cases which, I think, ought to be inquired into, and inquired into fully, and I very much regret that this has been rendered impossible by a Government to whom many of us looked for so much, to whom many of us looked for a reversal of the more official attitude of past years, and who we expected would have gone into these matters without prejudice, and with a free and open mind. I feel bound to make this protest at this stage of the Bill, and to express my regret that the inquiry has been limited in this way.

Amendment moved—

"To resolve, 'That, in the opinion of this House, the proposed inquiry is of too limited a character to serve any useful purpose.'"—(Earl Russell.)

Earl Russell.

EARL BEAUCHAMP: My Lords, the answer which I have to give to the noble Earl is probably the one which he anticipates, as it is exactly the same as the one I gave to a Question which he addressed to His Majesty's Government some time ago. I must, however, say that I am quite unable to agree with him that there is any general discontent with the action of His Majesty's Government in this matter. If there had been it would certainly have found expression in the other House, where, as a matter of fact, the Bill setting up the Royal Commission passed through all its stages without a division. The terms of reference, of which the noble Earl complains, are not really before your Lordships' House this afternoon. The Bill is concerned only with the nature of the powers to be conferred upon the Commission.

With regard to what the noble Earl has said generally on the question, I am sure I shall have the support of your Lordships in saying that the general confidence of the people of London in their police force is very great indeed. The metropolitan police occupies a position almost unique in that respect among the police forces of the various capitals of the world. But however great public confidence may be, agitations are bound to arise at times in certain quarters which tend to create a feeling of uneasiness. That, I think, has happened on the present occasion, and people have taken, as is not unusual, certain test cases. It is, therefore, thought desirable by His Majesty's Government that the particular cases which have attracted public attention should be referred for inquiry to as strong and impartial a body as it is possible for them to constitute. The case of Madame D'Angely and the boat race night incident are the two cases into which the Royal Commission will probably inquire first of all.

I cannot think with the noble Earl that any very useful purpose would be served by inquiring into the case of ex-Police-Constable Rolls, who, as the noble Earl told us, was released this morning. Rolls was convicted four and a-half years ago, and it is obvious that the memory of those concerned cannot be as fresh as it ought to be if a case of this importance is to be inquired into. I entirely repudiate the suggestion made by the noble Earl that it is the intention of His Majesty's Government to whitewash the metropolitan police, and I venture to think that the constitution of the Royal Commission is sufficient to exonerate His Majesty's Government in that matter. Mr. Alfred Lyttelton, Mr. W. H. Dickinson, Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Mr. D. Brynmor Jones, and Mr. C. A. Whitmore are gentlemen who are in no way likely to lend themselves to such a design as that attributed to His Majesty's Government by the noble Earl. I regret that we are unable to accept his Amendment.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I share with the noble Earl opposite the general confidence in the integrity and efficiency of the metropolitan police and in the independence of the Commissioners whom His Majesty's Government have appointed to inquire into this matter; but I think the noble Earl who has introduced the subject has reason to complain of the perfunctory nature of the reply given on behalf of His Majesty's Government. The noble Earl said, in the first place, that there had been no objection to the Bill in the other House. This is not the first time we have heard that argument, and on the last occasion that it was used it did not meet with very great success in your Lordships' House. It is particularly unfortunate on this occasion, because I gather from the usual channels of information that the reason no opposition was offered to the Bill was that His Majesty's Government declared that if there were any opposition or any serious attempt to amend the Bill they would not proceed with it at all; so that the House of Commons was, as it were, under a sort of duress to pass the Bill in this form and without discussion. The noble Earl who spoke on behalf of His Majesty's Government said that the terms of reference could not be called into question because they had been agreed to without discussion in the other House. Poor other House! they had no choice in the matter whatever. I venture to assert that for His Majesty's Government to say that the terms of reference are not open to discussion in your Lordships' House is an observation which ought not to be addressed to one of the Houses of Parliament. The terms of reference are included in the Bill, and therefore they are open to discussion by your Lordships. As to whether it would be wise or not to extend the scope of the reference, that is a matter upon which I do not pretend to have any strong opinion; but I think we should have been more able to form an opinion if the noble Earl who has just sat down had given us more reasons why it should not be extended. The noble Earl who raised this question gave reasons why the terms of reference should be extended, but the noble Earl who represents the Home Office did not respond in any adequate manner.

Lastly, the noble Earl opposite asked that those who were interested in the proceedings before this Commission should have an opportunity of seeing certain documents which were necessary for their case. The noble Earl said that he had made application to the Home Office and that the Home Office had refused to exercise their influence on his behalf in order to obtain these documents. The noble Earl who spoke for the Government appeared to think it best to pass over in silence that complaint of the noble Earl. The noble Earl was within his rights in contending that to communicate these documents to the Royal Commission if they asked for them was not the same as communicating them to parties who might be interested in the inquiry. I venture, with very great respect, to say to His Majesty's Government and to the noble Marquess who leads this House that your Lordships are entitled to a fuller reply on a matter of such importance than that which has been given by the noble Earl who has just sat down.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: My Lords, with regard to the last observations of the noble Marquess, it is true that my noble friend did not say anything with respect to magistrates' clerks' notes to which the noble Earl behind me referred; but surely it is obvious that if the witnesses wish to see those notes in order to place their case fully before the Commission they will submit their desires to the Commissioners. It is not according to usual practice to give notes of that kind to anybody who may ask for them. I have no doubt whatever that the magistrates would communicate the notes to the Royal Commission if the Commission required them. I have also no doubt that the Royal Commission, composed of such men as it is, would give ample time to any witness to consider those notes when they had procured them. But I do not think it would be desirable to set the precedent of interfering with the usual practice in a matter of this kind. Great inconvenience might arise from it. The Royal Commission are entitled to have the notes if they want them, and if witnesses require them they can have them.

I am sorry that the noble Marquess opposite is so displeased because my noble friend who represents the Home Office informed your Lordships that the terms of reference to the Commission were not open to discussion. What my noble friend said was that the terms of reference were not before your Lordships this afternoon. That is perfectly true. I did not understand my noble friend to say that your Lordships were precluded from discussing the terms of reference if you wished to do so, but that the reference did not form part of this Bill. The case is very simple. We all know that this Bill arose almost entirely out of a particular case, or, at all events, out of two cases. One of those cases has disappeared and the urgency of the Bill may therefore be less than it at one time was, but it was brought in as an urgent Bill for the purpose of making special inquiry, by eminently competent men, into two or three special cases.

It is not the intention of His Majesty's Government that the inquiry shall cover the whole working of the metropolitan police. That is a very large and difficult question, and it is not one which the Government ever intended to submit to this Commission. The purpose of the Commission is limited. The noble Earl who raised this question said that, supposing it should appear from the Report of the Commission that there ought to be a wider inquiry, those who advocated the wider inquiry would be met with the statement that there had been a Commission and there could not be another. If this Commission does establish a case for a larger inquiry of any kind into the general working of the metropolitan police, I have no doubt such an inquiry, in whatever way may be most appropriate, will take place. This Commission will not bar further investigation if it should be necessary, but His Majesty's Government have no ground for thinking that wider inquiry is necessary. I desire to associate myself entirely with the words which fell from my noble friend Earl Beauchamp with respect to the metropolitan police. I have the utmost confidence in the metropolitan police, and believe them to be an admirable body of public servants. There may be black sheep among them, as there are in every large institution, but as a body they are entitled to, and I believe they enjoy, the respect, not only of His Majesty's Government, but of the people of London.

INCLOSURES (COUNTY OF GLOUCESTER).

Return ordered, "showing (1) the number of Inclosures of common land made under the Inclosure Acts from 1845 to 1899, in the County of Gloucester; (2) list of parishes within which such lands are wholly or partly situate; (3) total acreage of such Inclosures; (4) average acreage of such Inclosures."—(Mr. Essex.)

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Pay in Dungannon Post Office.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.): To ask the Postmaster-General if he is aware that an officer appointed last year at the Dungannon office was started at 18s. per week, although over 20½ years of age; and, seeing that, under the Stanley revision, an officer is entitled to 18s. at 19 years of age, thus allowing him to reach 22s. at 21 years of age, will he have the officer referred to placed on this scale.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) It is the case that an officer was appointed at Dungannon last year at wages of 18s. a week although over 20 years of age. The rule that an officer is to receive 18s. at 19 years of age does not mean that in all cases he will receive more than 18s. if he is appointed at an age above 19.

British Consul at Chicago and the Meat Scandals.

SIR WILLIAM BULL (Hammersmith): To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether His Majesty's consul in Chicago has made any investigations into the charges against the meat business; and, if so, when his Report is likely to be received, and if it is proposed to publish it.

(Answered by Secretary Sir Edward Grey.) I suppose that the hon. Member has in his mind a telegram in the Press, stating that His Majesty's consul had inspected the meat-packing establishments, and that his Report was understood to be generally favourable. Mr. Finn, the consul in question, has telegraphed to the effect that he has refused to make any statements, but that he has written a Report, which was despatched on the 14th instant. I cannot say whether the Report will be published until I have examined it. It seems to me, however, that the subject is one which can only be adequately treated by an expert.

Unrest in Russia.

MR. HARWOOD (Bolton): To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that certain members of the Duma fear a revival of outrages on Jews; and whether any representations on the subject can be made by the British Foreign Office.

(Answered by Secretary Sir Edward Grey.) We have no official information, and the Question is not one which can be made the subject of official representations.

Payment to Messrs. Stillwell for Goods supplied to South African Constabulary.

MR. R. PEARCE (Staffordshire, Leek): To ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that goods supplied by Messrs. Stillwell and Son between October 1902 and August 1903, and amounting to £412 7s. 3d., to the officer then commanding E division, South African Constabulary, have not yet been paid for, in spite of many requests, calls, and correspondence with the authorities in South Africa and the Colonial Office up to the 25th April, 1906, since which date the supplying firm can get no further consideration; and whether he will take steps to have the matter settled.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The matter is one which cannot be conveniently discussed within the limits of a Question. It has formed the subject of prolonged correspondence with the authorities in South Africa, which is now being finally considered by the legal advisers of the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State must not be taken to admit that the facts are accurately stated in the Question or that the South African Constabulary are liable. In all probability the matter will prove to be one which can only be decided by a Court of Law.

Transfer of Second Division Clerks to Dublin.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in view of the fact that several Irish second division clerks serving in Government departments in London have intimated to the heads of these departments that they are desirous of being transferred to Government departments in Dublin, and that the Civil Service Commissioners recently issued a circular to English and Scotch second division clerks waiting for appointments, asking them if they would serve in Dublin, and actually appointed some of them there nolens volens, he can explain why the former were not transferred before circularising and appointing the latter.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) The Civil Service Commissioners inform me that for any vacancy for a permanent appointment in Ireland they always select an Irish candidate if one is available. Indeed, owing to a dearth of Irish competitors in the open competition last autumn they were at considerable pains to transfer Irish clerks from London departments. The circular to which the hon. Member refers concerned temporary service in Ireland, and to this purpose transfer was not applicable. Consequently volunteers for this temporary employment were asked for from among the candidates (residing in Great Britain), but no clerk was forced to go against his will, and no Irish candidate available was passed over.

Amounts and Rates of Interest on Sums issued under the Labourers (Ireland) Acts.

MR. O'MARA (Kilkenny, S.): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury, whether he will state the amounts and the varying rates of interest of sums issued under The Labourers (Ireland) Act, 1883, and subsequent Acts by the Commissioners of Public Works and other bodies; the total amount of principal outstanding at the various rates of interest; and whether he will consider the advisability of reducing the interest on these outstanding loans.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna). The total amount issued to 31st March 1906 under the Labourers Acts was £3,138,333 8s. 8d., at the following rates of interest:—2¾, 3, 3¼, 3⅜, 3½, 3¾, 4, and 4¼, per cent. At the same date the principle outstanding amounted to £2,601,737 5s. 11d., apportioned amongst the various rates of interest as follows:—

Rate.		Principal outstanding.
2¾	- -	9,710	7	0
3	- -	19,737	12	11
3⅜	- -	37,697	10	2
3½	- -	457,503	4	4
3¾	- -	1,328,581	3	11
4	- -	51,796	16	3
		£2,601,737	5	11

The rate of interest on each loan was one of the conditions on which the loan was made, and it would be contrary to the public interest to allow the terms of such bargains to be set aside.

Amounts and Rates of Interest of Sums issued under the Glebe Loans Act, 1870.

MR. O'MARA: To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will state the total amount issued under The Glebe Loans Act, 1870, by the Commissioners of Public Works, the average rate of interest charged, the principal repaid, and the principal now outstanding; and whether it is proposed to issue further sums under this Act.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.)—

Total amount issued to 31st March 1906 -	647,574	8	0
Rate of interest charged, 3½ per cent. per annum.
Principal repaid - -	352,947	2	11
Principal outstanding -	294,627	5	1

Loans are still being made under the Act which is renewed annually by the Expiring Laws Continuance Act.

Erection of National Schools in Ireland.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL (Longford, N): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he will state whether any progress has yet been made in providing for extended building expenditure under Plan VI. for the erection of national schools in Ireland.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) No settlement has yet been reached, I am sorry to say, the Commissioners of National Education having objected to the new plans prepared by the Board of Works at the instance of the Treasury. The Commissioners have now been asked to submit for the consideration of the Irish Government and the Treasury, their own suggestions for plans for schools to be built in future years.

Pensions for Foremen in the Naval Ordnance Department.

Mr. J. WILLIAMS BENN (Devonport): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he will take steps so that the scheme whereby 85 per cent. of the foremen of the Army Ordnance Department are placed on the pensionable establishment (70 General, No. 762, dated War Office June 1902) may be extended to the foremen of the Naval Ordnance Department, or that similar privileges may be extended as regards establishment, as are enjoyed by all other departments of the Admiralty; and also whether he is aware that the pay and increments of these foremen, are not equal to those enjoyed by men of similar rank at Woolwich and at certain Foreign depôts.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) As regards Woolwich, it has been approved to follow War Department lines for labour staff, and steps are now being taken to establish the principal foreman and 85 per cent. of the assistant principal foremen and foremen. The case of the other Naval Ordnance Depots is not yet settled, but it is expected a decision will be arrived at shortly.

Paying out of Guarantee Deposits under the Ashbourne Act.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL: To ask Mr. Attorney-General for Ireland whether any modification of the rules for the paying out of guarantee deposits in the case of the sale of estates under the Ashbourne Act, have been made; and, if so, when these modifications came into force, or were they altered under the subsequent rules.

(Answered by Mr. Cherry.) The release of guarantee deposits retained in the case of sales under the Purchase Acts, 1885 and 1888, is now governed by the 68th Section of The Irish Land Act, 1903, which repeals Sub-section 3 of Section 29 of the Act of 1896, and enables the Irish Land Commission to pay out to the person entitled the whole, or part of any guarantee deposit so retained under these Acts, in the same manner as if they had been retained under The Purchase of Land Act, 1891. Order XV. of the Rules of the Land Commission of 4th December, 1903, merely rescinds the previous rule in reference to such guarantee deposits having regard to the change in the law. This is the only modification of which I am aware.

Alien Pilotage Certificates.

Sir SEYMOUR KING (Hull, Central): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been directed to the rush which is now being made by Foreign masters and mates for pilotage certificates before the Merchant Shipping Act comes into force; and whether he will insert in the Bill a provision, that no alien pilotage certificate will be renewed which has been taken out after the date of the introduction of his Bill.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) My attention was called to the point when the Bill was before the Standing Committee on Trade. I met it by moving an Amendment to the effect that the only pilotage certificates to aliens which should be renewable, were those which were granted before the 1st day of June 1906. This has now been inserted in the Bill.

Amersham Water Company and Private Fire Hydrants.

Mr. GROVE (Northamptonshire, S.): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that the Amersham Water Company have declared their intention to discourage fire hydrants to private houses, and have refused to allow consumers to put in the same at their own expense, except under conditions to be decided by the company; and whether, seeing that such a policy subjects life and property in the country to risk, in the interests of a private company, he proposes to take steps to remove this public danger.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I have no information as to the declaration referred to. The matter to which it relates is not one with respect to which I have any control over the water company, but I will communicate with them on the subject.

Fishery Laws in the Lough Erne District.

MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH (Fermanagh, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Royal Irish Constabulary have taken any steps, since the Report of the Fishery Commission presided over by Lord Chancellor Walker, to enforce the fishery laws in the Lough Erne District; whether they have instituted any, and, if so, how many prosecutions for illegal fishing and destruction of spawning fish in Lough Erne and its tributaries, and, if any, how many convictions resulted from their prosecutions; has it been left to the Conservators of Fisheries to preserve Lough Erne, which is vested in the Crown; and is any contribution on behalf of the Crown paid to the Conservators' funds.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed that since the year 1901 the police have reported to the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction 17 cases of offences against the fishery laws in the Ballyshannon Fishery District, in which Lough Erne is situated. Prosecutions were instituted in all the cases, and fines were imposed in 13 of them. The duty of protecting the fisheries of Lough Erne rests primarily with the Board of Conservators, but the Commissioner of Woods informs me that he is willing to consider any practical suggestion as to how he can co-operate with the Conservators. No contribution is paid on behalf of the Crown to the funds of the Conservators.

Promotion in Irish Government Departments.

MR. FIELD: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state why promotion in the Irish Government Boards is not carried out under the seniority system; and whether he can explain what is the meaning attached to the word merit which ensures promotions in certain cases in Ireland, and overrides the seniority rule which generally prevails in Government appointments.

MR. FIELD: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will consider the advisability of appointing an impartial committee of inquiry into the methods of appointments and the rules governing promotions in Irish Government Departments.

MR. FIELD: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the fact that promotion by selection in the Irish Government Departments has given rise to discontent and consequent injury to the public service; and, seeing that promotion under this system lends itself least to favouritism, whether he will issue instructions to the heads of those departments to the effect that all promotions shall in future be made according to seniority and equality of efficiency.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Orders in Council applying to both the first and second divisions of the Civil Service of the United Kingdom generally provide that promotions shall be according to merit, not seniority. This rule was, I understand, established many years ago as the result of recommendations of commissions of inquiry into the Civil Service. I am not aware of any necessity for appointing a committee to inquire into the operation of the rule in Departments under the Irish Government, nor am I aware that any discontent in the matter exists in any of these Departments. I have no power, nor do I think it would be desirable, to issue instructions that promotions should be made according to seniority, without taking merit into account.

Duties and Pay of Attendants in the National Library of Ireland.

MR. HAZLETON (Galway, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in the National Library of Ireland the work of entering up the library ledgers, classifying books, corresponding with donors, listing parliamentary papers, and other clerical and technical work, formerly done by the assistant librarians, now forms part of the daily duties of some of the attendants; and whether he will take steps to secure that if men classed and paid as messengers are called upon to perform such duties they will be given opportunities of promotion and extra remuneration, as is the case in the library of the British Museum.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The entering of registers, which are described as ledgers, and the filling up of printed forms and copying, have for many years been recognised duties of library attendants. It would be going too far to say that the attendants classify books, though they assist in the work. Regard was had to these duties when the remuneration for attendants was being fixed.

Irish Agricultural Interests and Army Meat Contracts.

MR. P. A. MCHUGH (Sligo, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a copv of a Resolution, adopted by the Sligo Rural District Council at its meeting on May 30th ultimo, expressing alarm at the action of the War Office in altering the tenders of the supply of meat to the Army, and declaring such action to be seriously injurious to agricultural interests in Ireland; and what action, if any, does he propose to take in regard to this matter.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction are in communication with the Army Council in reference to this matter. I am not at present able to make a further statement on the subject.

Sale of the O'Grady Estate.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in the case of the sale of the O'Grady estate at Cam, county Longford, the agreements for sale have yet been lodged with the Estates Commissioners; and, if so, will an inspection be made.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that agreements for the purchase of holdings on the estate mentioned have not yet been lodged with them.

Erection of Pier at Bonmahon, County Waterford.

MR. POWER (Waterford, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will consider the claim of Bonmahon, county Waterford, to have a pier erected so as to enable the copper ore, to raise which two limited companies have been formed, to be transported direct by sea to South Wales, and so as to revive the fishing industry which was formerly of an important character.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed that when the mines at Bonmahon were worked in former days a pile jetty, the remains of which recently existed, was built by the mining company. The bay in which the jetty was situated is exposed, and, in the opinion of the Department of Agriculture, no harbour works that would give protection to fishing boats, except such as could be hauled up, could be erected without enormous cost. In the year 1902 the county council offered to contribute £1,000 towards the cost of a fishery pier, provided £2,000 were forthcoming from Government funds. The Department, however, were of opinion that no work which did not involve an expenditure of much more than £3,000 would provide accommodation for both the mining and fishing industries. Only three or four row boats fish out of Bonmahon.

Irish Evicted Tenants—Case of Laurence M'Evoy.

MR. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether an application for reinstatement has been made to the Estates Commissioners on behalf of the representative of the late Laurence M'Evoy, who was evicted from his farm at Johnsgrove, Mountmellick, Queen's County, in 1882, for non-payment of one-and-a-half year's rent, the yearly rent being £232; and whether, seeing that the farm has been since let for £110 a year, and that the present occupier, Mrs. Neale, is willing to surrender the holding under conditions, the Estates Commissioners will open negotiations with Mrs. Neale with the object of restoring the evicted tenant's representative to the holding.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners have referred the application in question to their inspector for inquiry, and until his report has been received they are unable to say what action they may take in the case.

Construction of a Causeway at Dungarvan.

MR. O'SHEE (Waterford, W.) To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received copies of Resolutions passed by the Waterford County Council, the Dungarvan Urban Council, and the Dungarvan Rural Council, with reference to the construction of a causeway from Dungarvan across the narrow and shallow channel which separates it from the promontory called the Cunnigar; whether he is aware that by the construction of this causeway, about one-fourth of a mile in length, over 8,000 acres of rich slob lands, usually covered with water from one to two feet in depth, can be reclaimed for the public benefit; whether he will refer to the memorial laid before the Secretary of State for India, when Chief Secretary for Ireland, on this subject; and whether he will take an early opportunity of visiting the district, and meanwhile obtain a report as to the feasibility of this work, which would greatly benefit the fisheries of the poorest district on the South coast of Ireland, namely Ballinagoul.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I have received the Resolutions referred to, and have called for reports on the subject, though I am afraid that funds are not at present available for any works of the kind. I have seen the memorial which was presented in 1894 to the then Chief Secretary. Should I at any time find myself in the neighbourhood of Dungarvan, I will endeavour to make an opportunity of visiting the Cunnigar.

Inland Drainage System in Ireland.

MR. VINCENT KENNEDY (Cavan, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a Resolution from the Greilly and Castlesaunderson districts of county Cavan pointing out the urgent necessity for a thorough inland drainage system in the country; and will the matter have his immediate attention.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I have received the Resolution in question, which urges the necessity of a system of inland drainage in the county, and suggests that it should be entrusted to county and district councils. The consideration of this matter must await the Report of the Arterial Drainage Commission at present sitting.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Naval Officers' Eyesight.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the Board are aware that failure of eyesight does take place in some cases after the first test of officers at the age of about thirteen years; and whether in view of the increasing speed of ships and the fact that gun fire may be opened in action at such long ranges as 10,000 yards, the Board are prepared to test the eyesight of all officers filling responsible positions in charge of His Majesty's ships or their armaments.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON, Dundee): Failure of eyesight does take place in some cases after the first test of vision at the age of about thirteen. Officers are from time to time invalided from the Service on account of this during their subsequent careers when the defect is brought to notice, and is considered sufficiently serious to render them unfit for their special work. The proposal contained in the second part of the Question is considered unnecessary, it being every captain's duty, in furnishing confidential reports on his officers, to specify any physical defects that may impair an officer's fitness for the duties assigned to him.

MR. BELLAIRS: May I ask who is to make these reports when the captain himself is short-sighted? I can give the hon. Gentleman specific cases in the Royal Navy.

[No Answer was returned.]

Admiralty Glass Contracts.

MR. STAVELEY HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty why the usual custom of inviting tenders from British glass manufacturers, for the supplies of glass ware to the Admiralty, has this year been departed from.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: Revised patterns of table glass—to which it is understood the Question refers—were instituted this year. The firm from whom they were obtained went to a great deal of trouble to assist the Admiralty in the matter, and, in accordance with the usual custom in such cases, the first order was placed with them, their quotation being very reasonable. In future orders the contract will be open to competition.

History of the South African War.

MR. H. R. MANSFIELD (Lincolnshire, Spalding): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether a chapter or chapters will be found in the official History of the South African War on the transactions in war stores and the revelations concerning the management of these commissariat services, including a summary of the Butler Report and the forthcoming Report of the War Stores Commission.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. HALDANE, Haddingtonshire): There is no intention of reproducing in the official History of the War in South Africa the matter which will be published with the Report of the War Stores Commission.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S): When is this famous work coming out? We are all anxious to see it.

Army Meat Contracts.

MR. O'DOWD (Sligo, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that a feeling of alarm has been created amongst agriculturists in Ireland owing to the action of the War Office in altering the tenders for the supply of meat to the Army; whether he is aware that many meetings of public bodies have been held throughout the country, at which Resolutions have been passed declaring that such action on the part of the War Office will be detrimental to the best interests of the farming classes in Ireland; and whether, in view of such facts, he is prepared to take any action in the matter.

MR. HALDANE: Representations on this subject have reached the War Office, but I see no reason to reverse the decision of the War Office in regard to the tenders for the supply of meat to the troops.

LORD TURNOUR (Sussex, Horsham): Has the right hon. Gentleman also received representations from any bodies of English agriculturists?

MR. HALDANE: I am not sure; I think it is very likely I have.

Despatches to the Commonwealth Government.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the dissatisfaction expressed at the marking of despatches to the Commonwealth Government as "Confidential," he can promise that all despatches on public affairs may be published if so desired by the Commonwealth Government for the information of the public in Australia.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. CHURCHILL, Manchester, N.W.): The Secretary of State has received no such request as that contained in my hon. friend's Question from the Commonwealth Government; and it is clear that such a rule as he is seeking to establish would prove absolutely fatal to the freedom of official correspondence in all matters, most of all in those which relate to negotiations with foreign governments.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Has the hon. Gentleman's attention been called to the statements of the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth and also of the late Mr. Seddon complaining that despatches which they deemed to be of interest to the Australian public are marked "Confidential?"

MR. CHURCHILL: I have. I can assure the hon. Member that the Secretary of State will do everything in his power to meet the wishes of the Colonial Prime Minister in this matter.

Transvaal Tariff.

Mr. WEDGWOOD (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the new tariff proposed for the Transvaal will be introduced before responsible Government is granted; if so, whether it can be laid upon the Table of the House, together with the present tariff, before it is so introduced into the Transvaal Legislative Assembly; and whether this contemplated tariff provides for preferential treatment of Cape Dop brandy.

Mr. CHURCHILL: The increased duties under the new tariff came into effect from May 25th. It was laid upon the Table last month. The hon. Member will find it in Cd. 2977 and the previous tariff of 1903 in Cd. 1599. Preferential treatment of spirits manufactured within territories forming the Union is secured by a Customs Duty and Excise not exceeding 2s. per Imperial Proof Gallon, whilst imported spirits are subject to a duty per proof gallon of not less than 19s.

Mission Services in Malta.

Mr. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the fact that the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Malta in a letter, dated the 6th ultimo, to the Governor, stated that the conducting of a Protestant mission in the Theatre Royal would constitute a violation of the pledges made by His Majesty's Government, he can state what these alleged promises were.

Mr. SILCOCK (Somersetshire, Wells): May I also ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can inform the House what are the pledges to which the Archbishop of Malta refers in his recently published letters to the Governor as having been made by the British Government to the Roman Catholic Church in Malta; are they such as to interfere with the liberty of British subjects in the Island who are not members of that Church; and is the holding of religious meetings in the theatre a breach of the promises made by the British Government.

Mr. CHURCHILL: The Secretary of State is not aware to what pledges the Archbishop of Malta referred. The only promise made at the time when Malta passed under British control was that the King would protect the churches and religion of the Maltese: and the only restriction to which other religious bodies than Roman Catholics are now subject is that processions and other ceremonies are not allowed to take place in public. It will be seen from the correspondence about to be laid before Parliament that the Governor refused to admit the Archbishop's contention that the holding of a religious meeting in the Theatre Royal was a departure made from any promises made by His Majesty's Government.

Mr. T. L. CORBETT (Down, N.) asked whether the Under-Secretary was aware that the Rev. John McNeill had been prevented from holding services in Malta. Mr. McNeill was a highly respected and distinguished Member of the Presbyterian Church, who had never been known to use language of an insulting or irritating character towards Members of the Roman Catholic communion.

Mr. CHURCHILL: That is a very valuable tribute from which I should not desire in any degree to detract.

Opium Trade in India.

Mr. SLOAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether, in view of the unanimous approval of the Opium Resolution by this House,† he can state what action, if any, he proposes to take in the matter.

*The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Mr. John Ellis, Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe): In speaking on the Resolution referred to, the Secretary of State said His Majesty's Minister at Peking would very shortly be in this country, and we should then be able to learn from him exactly how the proposals and disposition of the Chinese Government stand.‡ The Minister is not yet in this country.

Mr. SLOAN: Will the result of the investigation, when made, be at once made known to the House?

*Mr. JOHN ELLIS: I cannot make any statement of that kind.

Governorship of Harrar.

Mr. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can state who has been appointed to succeed Ras Makunan, as Governor of Harrar.

The SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir Edward Grey, Northumberland, Berwick): No successor has yet been announced. As soon as one is appointed, we shall be informed by His Majesty's Representative in Abyssinia.

Trading Stamps.

Mr. J. WARD (Stoke-on-Trent): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the Bill recently introduced in the Jersey States Assembly, prohibiting under severe penalties the use of trading stamps as an unfair means of trading; and whether, in view of the danger of intimidation of small traders arising from the use of trading stamps in this country, he will consider the advisability of introducing similar legislation for the United Kingdom.

*The SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. Gladstone, Leeds, W.): I regret that I do not see my way to introduce legislation of the nature suggested by the hon. Member. The Réglement passed by the States of Jersey in February last did not become law, and the question is still under their consideration.

Mr. J. WARD: Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware that the States Assembly in Jersey has introduced still more stringent legislation on this subject?

*Mr. GLADSTONE: I am not aware. I have no information as to that.

Mr. J. WARD: I will send some to the right hon. Gentleman.

The Wreck of the "Courier."

Sir W. J. COLLINS (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been directed to the shipwreck of the "Courier" off Guernsey, on April 30th last, and to the evidence taken at the inquest held on one of the seven persons who were drowned; whether, in view of the evidence given, and of the fact that the law relating to navigation in the Channel Islands differs from the Imperial Merchant Shipping Act, he will direct that a public inquiry be held into all the circumstances connected with this disaster.

*Mr. GLADSTONE: I beg to answer this Question on behalf of my right hon. friend. A full public inquiry has already been held at the inquest, which took place before the Royal Court presided over by the Bailiff, Sir Henry Giffard, K.C., and as the result proceedings have been taken against Captain Whales and his pilot's licence has been forfeited. As advised, I have no power to order any further public inquiry, but I am of opinion that the law in Guernsey ought to provide as effectually as English law for the safety of passengers and I propose to communicate with the Insular authorities on the subject.

Transit of Agricultural Produce.

Mr. JOYCE (Limerick): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been drawn to a claim made by the Irish Co-operative Agency Society, Limited, Limerick, against the Great Western Railway Company of England and the London and South Western Railway Company over the smashing of boxes of butter, consigned to Haselmere Dairy, Haselmere, Surrey, in June, 1905; has any satisfactory settlement of the claim been made by the railway companies concerned; and, if not, will the Board of Trade take any action to compel those companies to fulfil their public obligations.

The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE (Mr. Lloyd-George, Carnarvon Boroughs): My attention had not been previously drawn to the claim to which the hon. Member refers, but I have forwarded a copy of his Question to the two railway companies mentioned, and have received their replies of which I am sending copies to the hon. Member. The case seems to be one in which the aggrieved party has an adequate legal remedy, and not one in which the Board of Trade can take action.

Post-Office Contracts with the Westminster Construction Company.

Mr. J. WARD: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he can give the following particulars with reference to the wages paid by the Westminster Construction Company when engaged on Post Office work in London and district, navvies and labourers per hour, ditto duct layers, timbermen, socket jointers, and gangers, with extra pay, if any, for overtime worked; also the average time worked per man winter and summer.

The POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. Sydney Buxton, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): The Company have furnished me with the following information. Their rates of pay to men employed on Post Office contract work in the London districts are: navvies per hour 7d. and 7½d.; labourers per hour 7d. and 7½d.; duct layers per hour 7½d.; timbermen per hour 7½d.; socket jointers per hour 7½d.; gangers per hour 8d. For overtime the system of the Company is to pay at the rate of a quarter of a day for two hours work, i.e., approximately time and a quarter. The normal day's work is ten hours. The average time worked by each man could not be ascertained without much trouble and expense.

Mr. J. WARD: The wages paid to the duct layers and timbermen are not Trades Union rates. Will the right hon. Gentleman approach the firm on that point?

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON: I will look into that matter.

Glasgow Post Office Medical Officer.

Mr. CLELAND (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General, when the vacancy at present existing in the post of medical officer to the post office at Glasgow will be filled.

Mr. MITCHELL-THOMSON (Lanarkshire, N.W.): May I also ask the Postmaster General, what steps he proposes to take to fill the vacancy for the office of post office medical officer for Glasgow?

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON: The district hitherto assigned to the medical officer at Glasgow has been too large for administrative convenience. Now that an opportunity of a re-arrangement has arrived, I propose to divide the district into several separate sections; and until a scheme has been decided upon I am unable to make any appointment.

Exemption from Rating for Schools.

Mr. J. WARD: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether he will make provision in the present Education Bill now before Parliament for exempting council schools from rating, as is the case at present with non-provided schools.

The PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. Birrell, Bristol, N.): As the whole question of rating is now under consideration and will doubtless have to be reviewed very thoroughly, it is not proposed to make any further extensions of the principle of exemption from rates in the present Bill.

Higher Education.

Mr. ASHLEY: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether he will introduce a measure for the co-ordination of the powers to aid higher education at present vested in the Board of Education, the Board of Agriculture, and the Treasury, with a view to removing the administrative difficulties arising under the present Law.

Mr. BIRRELL: I have nothing to add to the Answer which I gave yesterday to a similar Question on this subject beyond reminding the hon. Member that Section 2 (2) of the Board of Education Act, 1889, makes any such legislation as he suggests unnecessary so far as the Board of Agriculture is concerned, even if difficulties needing drastic remedies existed, which I do not think is the case. Nor am I aware of any administrative difficulties with the Treasury for which legislation is in any way required.

St. Joseph's School, Handsworth.

Mr. BOLAND (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether he is aware that in a communication from the Board of Education, dated February 28th, 1905, to the manager of St. Joseph's School, Handsworth, Sheffield, it was stated that it was for the Board to decide whether a school is efficiently maintained, and to take such steps as may appear necessary if they are not satisfied that the local education authority are properly carrying out their duties in this respect; can he state whether the local education authority is now maintaining that school efficiently; and, if not, what steps does he intend to take to compel it to do so.

MR. BIRRELL: So far as the board are aware the school is being efficiently maintained, and they do not know of any grounds for action being taken of the nature indicated by the hon. Member.

MR. BOLAND: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in this case the local education authority, instead of giving the headmaster a salary of £140, is only giving him £90? Is that to be considered maintaining the school efficiently?

MR. BIRRELL: All we have to do is to get a report whether the school is or is not efficiently managed. We are told it is. I will, however, look into the matter.

Charity Commission Fund Investment

MR. H. R. MANSFIELD: I beg to ask the hon. Member for the Elland Division, as a Parliamentary Charity Commissioner, if he can state the amount of capital invested by the Charity Commissioners in foreign securities and the amount of agricultural land sold by the Charity Commissioners during the last ten years.

MR. TREVELYAN (Yorkshire, W.R., Elland): The investments of capital directed by the Commissioners are limited to securities authorised for trust funds by the rules of Court, and are not made accordingly in foreign securities. The amounts so invested by founders or trustees which have been transferred to, and are now held by, the official trustees are as follows—

	£
Foreign Government Funds	11,600
Other Foreign Securities	56,500

Statistics of the amount of land sold with consent of the Commissioners have been recorded only for the last four years, in accordance with the promise made by them on July 29th, 1901, at request of the hon. Member for the Ilkeston Division of Derbyshire, distinguishing, however, merely between land in urban and rural districts. The amount sold in the four years in rural districts was 5,727 acres, of which the bulk was probably agricultural land.

Sutherland Deer Forest.

MR. MORTON (Sutherland): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he is aware that within the last twelve months three homesteads have been broken up near Kinbrace, Sutherland, comprising over 1,000 acres, the houses on two of them blown up by dynamite, and the farms, nearly one-third of which was arable land, turned into a deer forest; and whether the Government intend to take steps to prevent such clearances in future.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. SINCLAIR, Forfarshire): As I have no information as to the facts alleged, I can make no statement of policy.

MR. MORTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman make inquiries?

MR. SINCLAIR: Yes, Sir.

Irish Magistracy—Appointment Fees.

MR. CONDON (Tipperary, E.): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney-General for Ireland whether he is aware that the fees payable on the appointment of a county justice of the peace in England and Wales amount to £2 altogether, and only to 5s. if the commission is conferred by reason of the holding of an office such as the chairmanship of the county council; what are the fees payable in Ireland in these cases, respectively; and whether he will take steps to give Ireland equality of treatment in this matter.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. CHERRY, Liverpool Exchange): The statement in the Question of the amount of fees payable on the appointment of county magistrates in England and Wales is not quite accurate, as can be seen by reference to the Parliamentary Return ordered by the House of Commons to be printed on April 20th, 1894. (Parliamentary Paper No. 82.) No fees of any kind are now payable on the appointment, or swearing in, of ex-officio justices, such as chairmen of councils under the Local Government Act. Such justices can be sworn in without the payment of any fee before resident magistrates sitting at petty sessions. The Commission of the Peace issued to ordinary magistrates must, under the Rules of Court made pursuant to the Judicature Act of 1877, bear judicature stamps denoting the payment of £6. This fee is collected in the Crown and Hanaper Office, and transmitted through the Inland Revenue to the receipts of the Public Exchequer. No other fees of any kind are payable in respect of the appointment or swearing in of a magistrate in Ireland.

MR. CONDON: What are the fees payable in England?

MR. CHERRY: I believe they vary in different counties. The hon. Member can see by referring to the Parliamentary Paper I have quoted.

Mallow Rent Appeals.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the action of Mr. J. G. Kelly, Assistant Land Commissioner, in raising the rent of James O'Flynn, of Cecilstown, Castlemagner, Mallow, from £94 7s. to £96 13s. 6d.; is he aware that Coroner Byrne, a land valuer of experience, valued the holding at £73 6s., and that the original rent of £94 7s. was fixed by the landlord, the late Sir Henry Beecher, twenty-five years ago; and will he say what qualifications and experience in valuing land does Mr. Kelly possess; and whether instructions to have due regard to Section 8, Sub-section (9), of of the Act of 1881, are issued to the Sub-Commissioners.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): The hon. Member appears to have been misinformed as to the facts of this case. According to the information supplied to me by the Land Commission, Mr. O'Flynn is the tenant of three holdings, the rents of which were judicially fixed by the Sub-Commission last month. The sum of the rents which have now been judicially fixed for a first statutory term, is £96 13s. 6d.; but the sum of the former rents was £132 10s., and not £94 7s. as stated. I have no information as to Mr. Byrne's valuation of the holdings. Mr. Kelly's qualifications and experience are stated in Parliamentary Paper No. 151 of 1902. The Land Commission do not issue instructions to Sub-Commission Courts as to the performance of their judicial functions.

Caldbeck Estate, Queen's County.

MR. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in the proposed sale of the Caldbeck Estate, Ballacolla, Queen's County, one-half of which is untenanted, the landlord has parcelled out the greater portion of the latter amongst the eleven months' graziers for the purpose of the sale; and, seeing that part of the estate is congested and the small tenants and labourers have applied for a division of the untenanted land, whether he can say what course the Estates Commissioners propose taking in the case.

MR. BRYCE: I beg to refer to my reply to the hon. Member's Question on this subject on Thursday last.† As I then stated, the Estates Commissioners themselves propose to make an offer for the purchase of this estate.

Irish Teachers.

MR. EDWARD BARRY (Cork County, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether teachers completing their course of training in the year 1900, when new rules were issued, have since got special consideration given to their cases; whether such teachers being induced to join the service by the belief that the rules and salaries existing at the time of their entry would be continued have not been misled and injured by the changes made in the year 1900, and which, if issued earlier, would have kept many of them out of the service; whether, seeing that those men feel that there has been a breach of contract with them, steps will be taken to have the cases of all men who completed a two years' course of training in the year 1900 fully inquired into; whether he is aware that W. J. Murphy, of Coolmountain National School, Dunmanway, is one of those teachers, and that on appointment to principalship this man lost the bonus which he would get as assistant after five years' service, and has had no other increase to his salary; and, seeing that this is a type of the favourable consideration which the Commissioners give to those teachers induced to join the profession under false pretences, he will say what action he proposes to take.

MR. BRYCE: The Commissioners of National Education inform me that the reply to the first inquiry is in the affirmative. They tell me that since the foundation of the system they have made many changes in the mode of promoting teachers and of remunerating them, that all teachers entering the service know that the rules of the service are subject to change from time to time, that the teachers have not been misled or injured by the new rules, and, indeed, that most of the changes made in 1900 had been agitated for by the teachers themselves for years before. This was the case especially with regard to the abolition of the results payment system and of the system of promotion by examination; the introduction of the consolidated salary with periodic increments; and the freedom of instruction in the schools. The new regulations would, in the Commissioners' opinion, have been subjected to precisely the same criticisms if issued earlier as they were when issued in 1900. There has, the Commissioners inform me, been no breach of contract with the teachers either generally or individually. The vested rights of all teachers in the service prior to 1900 were conserved, so far as it was possible to do so, by regulations made for the purpose, and all exceptional cases were specially considered. I am forwarding to the hon. Member full particulars of the case of Mr. Murphy. His present income as principal teacher is higher than it would have been if he had remained an assistant teacher, and he is eligible for promotion to the first grade, whereas if he had remained an assistant he could not have proceeded beyond the third grade. These matters are within the control of the Commissioners and do not call for action on the part of the Irish government.

Irish Fisheries.

MR. POWER (Waterford, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that since the introduction of steam trawling upon the south coast of Ireland the supply of trawl fish has greatly diminished, and the price of same largely increased and the number of fishermen employed in fishing has largely decreased; is he aware that the inspectors of fisheries have the power to make bye-laws prohibiting steam trawling in areas outside the three-mile limit; did those who signed the memorial recently addressed to the inspectors of fisheries from Dunmore East, county Waterford, ask the inspectors to exercise those powers; and, if so, could he state on what ground that application was refused.

MR. BRYCE: A proposed extension of the area off the coasts of the counties of Cork, Waterford, and Wexford, in which steam trawling is at present prohibited, formed the subject of an exhaustive inquiry held by the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction at Dunmore East on May 3rd and 4th, 1906. The Department did not consider that the circumstances of the case were such as would warrant them in submitting for the approval of the Lord-Lieutenant in Council any bye-law increasing the area in which steam trawling is prohibited. The prohibited area already extends to places at a greater distance than three miles from the shore. In reply to a further Question, Mr. Bryce said there were differences of opinion as to whether trawling did diminish the supply of fish.

MR. JOYCE: It affects the fishermen.

Housing of the Working Classes in Irish Towns.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the need for better housing of the artisans and labourers in the towns of Ireland, he can promise that the matter will engage the attention of the Government at an early date.

MR. BRYCE: I am aware of the need mentioned in the Question and of the importance of the subject generally, and I hope that it may be possible to find time before long to consider what should be done to amend the law bearing on it. So many other urgent questions are before the Irish Government at this moment that I cannot at present make any more definite statement.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that his predecessor in office (the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dover) promised to introduce legislation on this matter, and in considering this question will he also bear in mind the Report of the Conference on the Housing of the Working Classes recently held in Dublin.

MR. BRYCE: I was not aware of the promise. I will bear in mind the Report referred to.

Irish Lunacy Grant.

MR. COGAN (Wicklow, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will cause steps to be taken to recoup the county and borough councils from the local taxation account their rateable share of the sum of £37,030, which was voted to that account in the year 1900, as capitation grant for the maintenance of lunatics for the period of three months, from January 1st to April 1st, 1898.

MR. BRYCE: The hon. Member is under a misapprehension. No recoupment to county and borough councils is called for by the circumstances. In no year have the councils received less than a full twelve months' grant. The necessity for taking the Supplementary Vote of the year 1900 arose from a change in the financial year of local authorities, and the object of the Vote was merely to adjust accounts between the Parliamentary Vote and the local taxation account, as the hon. Member will see by referring to Parliamentary Paper No. 280 of July 17th, 1900.

MR. COGAN asked whether the county and borough councils were not compelled to strike a rate for fifteen months in consequence of the change.

MR. BRYCE: That may be so, but the fact remains that all they can receive for public funds they have got.

Sheep Dipping in Ireland.

MR. DELANY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any representations have been made by the Irish Agricultural Department to the Irish Government, in reference to the utilisation of the services of the Royal Irish Constabulary in connection with compulsory sheep dipping in Ireland; and, if so, with what result; and whether he will lay upon the Table of the House copies of any correspondence that may have taken place on the matter.

MR. BRYCE: Representations to the effect stated have been made by the Department of Agriculture, and the Inspector-General offers no objection to the proposal that the police should give such assistance to local authorities in the matter as they may be qualified to give, and as their primary duties may permit. The extent to which this may be possible is under consideration. It would be contrary to practice to lay upon the Table of the House the correspondence which passes between Departments of the Government.

Reenard Pier.

MR. BOLAND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the fact that he has recently held a personal inspection of the pier accommodation at Reenard, near Cahirciveen, he is now in a position to state what steps will be taken to construct a suitable pier at this point under the provisions of the Marine Works Act.

MR. BRYCE: Since my inspection of the pier accommodation at Reenard, I have asked the Board of Works to report upon the best method of effecting improvements, in the event of its being found possible to provide funds for the purpose. It will, I imagine, take the Board some little time to make the necessary investigation.

Kerry Evicted Tenant.

MR. MURPHY (Kerry, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Earl of Kenmare, when approached by the Estates Commissioners as to the reinstatement of Mr. Daniel Shea, an evicted tenant in county Kerry, made a claim for £500 or thereabouts as a condition of reinstatement; will he say whether the Commissioners were aware of the full counter-claim of the evicted tenant against this sum claimed by Lord Kenmare; and whether the Commissioners will further negotiate with Lord Kenmare, and represent to him the claims of the evicted tenant, with the view of effecting Mr. Shea's reinstatement in his farm, as it is at present unoccupied.

MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that in pursuance of the fourth regulation of those dated February 13th, 1906, they approached Lord Kenmare's agent on March 22nd last, with the object of endeavouring to effect a settlement of the case of Daniel Shea. In reply they were informed that the owner would reinstate Shea in the holding from which his mother was evicted upon his paying a sum of £504, the amount of rent and costs due at the date of the eviction. The Commissioners are not aware of the particulars of any counterclaim which the evicted tenant may have against the sum mentioned; and in any event they have no power to enforce the reinstatement of this tenant against the will of the landlord.

MR. MURPHY asked if the right hon. Gentleman would represent to the Estates Commissioners the desirability of greater activity in dealing with these cases.

MR. BRYCE: I understand that the Commissioners have done all they can in the matter. Their powers are limited, but if the hon. Member will address to me any communication containing additional information I will forward it on to them.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.) suggested that where the police were engaged in protecting land grabbers on these farms they should be withdrawn.

MR. BRYCE: That raises a question of an entirely different nature.

MR. FLAVIN: It would, at any rate, very soon bring the landlords to their senses.

Sale of Leitrim Bogs.

MR. T. SMYTH (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state who divided the bogs on the estate of the Duc de Stackpool at Cloontabrit, in the county of Leitrim, which has been sold to the tenants recently; if he is aware that some of the tenants, including Mrs. Mary Donnelly, James Cassells, Patrick Reynolds, and William Cox, were allotted portions of the bog which are worthless; and if he can state for what reason those particular tenants got such lots, while other tenants got the best portions of the bog.

MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that no proceedings for the purchase of the estate in question have been instituted before them, and they have no knowledge of the matters referred to.

Leitrim Evicted Tenant.

MR. T. SMYTH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if the Estates Commissioners have received an application for reinstatement from an evicted tenant named Francis McHugh, who formerly lived at Drumallow, Cloone, county Leitrim, on the Madden estate; and, as this estate has been sold a short time ago to the tenants, if he can state will McHugh be reinstated on his former holding, or will the Estates Commissioners provide him with another holding on the estate.

MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners have received from Francis McHugh an application for reinstatement, and will have the case inquired into by the inspector when he visits the estate.

Irish Mackerel Exports to Chicago.

MR. BOLAND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the statement, on page 25 of the latest Consular Report from Chicago, to the effect that, as a result of a visit of an official of the Irish Congested Districts Board, the importation of Irish mackerel into Chicago has increased from £550 in 1902 to £8,197 in 1905; and whether, with a view to the further development of the export of Irish mackerel to America, he will take steps to have this information circulated in the fishing districts of the West Coast, and to secure the adoption of a brand for Irish cured fish, with a view to maintaining the position now held by it in the American market.

Mr. BRYCE: The official in question was sent in the year 1901 by the Department of Agriculture to visit and report on those American markets in which Irish cured mackerel and herrings are sold. As a result, the Department have been able to bring Irish curers and American buyers into touch with each other. Irish curers generally are well aware of the market for their fish which exists in Chicago. The official above referred to also reported that a Government brand for Irish mackerel consigned to America would possess no value. The principal curers in Ireland, who were consulted, were not in favour of such a brand.

Town Tenants Bill.

Mr. VINCENT KENNEDY (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a resolution from the Cavan Urban District Council urging the necessity of passing the Town Tenants Bill; and, in view of the situation at present existing in Mr. Mulligan's case at Arva, county Cavan, will he state the Government's intentions on this measure?

Mr. BRYCE: The resolution referred to has been received. I have communicated with the Prime Minister regarding the Town Tenants Bill, and he authorises me to say that the Government are willing to facilitate the reference of this Bill to one of the Standing Committees of the House, and to give a reasonable amount of time—I trust that only a very short time will be needed—to the Motion to that effect now standing on the Order Book. This arrangement is made on the understanding that the parts of the Bill which might give rise to lengthened discussion will be dropped in Committee so as to facilitate the passage of the measure.

Irish Poor Law Commission.

Mr. BARRIE (Londonderry, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can now name a date for presenting the Report of the Poor Law Commission, Ireland; what has been the cause of the dates previously indicated being so much exceeded; and whether he is aware that local authorities, pending receipt of the Report, have preferred to delay incurring large outlays for improvements on their buildings, but are now being pressed by the Local Government Board.

Mr. BRYCE: I am informed by the Chairman of the Poor Law Reform Commission that the Commissioners have not yet agreed upon quite all the questions that must be dealt with in their Report. An agreement has, however, been arrived at between the Commissioners upon nearly all the points involved in the reference and dealt with in their draft Report, which has been in print for some time. The Commissioners, while expecting to report without much further delay, cannot fix a date for the presentation of their Report. The Local Government Board are aware that some local authorities are delaying the carrying out of improvements on their buildings pending the receipt of the Report, and, except in cases in which the work is of an urgent character, no pressure is being put upon these authorities by the Board.

Mr. BARRIE: But on May 10th last the right hon. Gentleman told me that the Report was then in the hands of the printers.† Why this long delay?

Mr. BRYCE: Alterations are often made in Reports after they are in proof. It seems that the anticipation of an early complete agreement among the Commission then entertained has not been realised.

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Has not the delay been in part caused by the chairman of the Commission being engaged on another inquiry?

Mr. BRYCE: I have no reason to think that.

Mr. BARRIE: Will the right hon. Gentleman address a remonstrance to the Commission and press on them the urgency of sending in the Report.

Mr. BRYCE: I will convey to the Commission the information that the Report is anxiously awaited, although I think they know that already.

Macroom Gun Licence Prosecution.

Mr. SHEEHAN (Cork County, Mid.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the † See (4) Debates, clvi., 1491.

Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Patrick J. Long, of Rylane sub-district, Macroom, recently applied for a Peace Preservation Act licence for keeping a gun, and that his application was refused without any cause whatever being assigned; and whether he proposes to take any action in the matter.

MR. BRYCE: The power of issuing licences under the Peace Preservation Act is vested in the resident magistrate of the district. I am imformed that in the present case the resident magistrate, in the exercise of the discretion vested in him, declined to issue a licence. It would be contrary to practice to state in this House the grounds upon which a licence is refused.

Cavan Evicted Tenant.

MR. VINCENT KENNEDY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have received an application for reinstatement from one John Reilly, Killeshandra, who was evicted from his holding in Crenagh Glebe in March, 1883; has the landlord, M. E. Moore, been approached; and, if not, are any steps being taken in the matter.

MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners have received the application in question, and have referred it to one of their inspectors for inquiry with a view to effecting a settlement.

Instruction in the Irish Language.

MR. BOLAND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, under the new scheme for the teaching of Irish, the services of a large number of extern teachers, teaching a much larger number of schools, have been put an end to and rejected by the new scheme and nothing is done to supply their place; and that as regards the teaching of Irish on the bilingual system, the Irish public are still in the dark as to what is proposed; and whether he proposes to secure the alteration of the scheme in the manner requested by the Gaelic League.

MR. BRYCE: The question whether it may be necessary or desirable to permit the employment of extern teachers under the new scheme for the teaching of Irish is under consideration, and so is the scheme for bilingual instruction. I am not at present in a position to make a statement upon these matters.

The Gaelic League and the Teaching of Irish.

MR. BOLAND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the official statement made by the executive committee of the Gaelic League with reference to the revised scheme for the teaching of Irish in the national schools; whether he is aware that objection is taken by the Gaelic League on the grounds, amongst others, that infants and the first class have been excluded, that the proposed fees are so small as to be quite nugatory, and that the total expenditure in remuneration of the teaching of Irish has been reduced from about £12,000 to under £6,000, and perhaps to a much smaller amount; and can he say what steps he proposes to take in the matter with a view to giving effect to the changes requested by the Gaelic League.

MR. BRYCE: The abolition of the former scheme for the teaching of Irish was decided upon before His Majesty's present Government came into office, and they found that no provision was being made for giving further aid in the matter. The present provision is a new one, and is in addition to the £12,000 which was diverted by the late Government from the teaching of Irish to the payment of additional assistant mistresses. It is not the case that the total expenditure upon the teaching of Irish has been reduced to below £6,000. I do not quite know what changes the Gaelic League desire to be made. Everyone interested in the teaching of Irish has had full opportunity of stating views and offering suggestions. I have myself frequently invited suggestions, but though I have received objections and remarks on the general question, I have had hardly any positive suggestions for the improvement of this particular plan. Though the amount to be expended is smaller than under the former plan, there is every ground for expecting the educational results to be much better than were previously attained. It is the wish of the Irish Government to give every proper help to the teaching of Irish, subject to the condition that other essential subjects are not interfered with; and I believe the new scheme will have that effect. It is, however, a provisional scheme only, and I shall be happy during the next few months to reconsider the whole question, duly weighing any suggestions regarding the teaching of Irish which may be sent to me.

Irish Board of Works—Pensioned Officials.

Mr. JOYCE: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that the following men got pensions from the Irish Board of Works: T. P. L. Crosthwaite, engineer; James Gulley, lock keeper; Daniel Morgan, lock keeper and collector; Cornelius Hogan, lock keeper and collector; and Mr. Bushel, also a lock keeper; and will he say what was the yearly pension in each case; and whether, taking all the circumstances into account, the claim of Robert M'Conkey, who was overseer of 210 miles of the Shannon for a long term of years, will be considered with a view to granting him a pension.

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. McKenna, Monmouth, N.): The pensions referred to are as follow:—

Mr. T. P. S. Crosthwaite, M.I.C.E., inspector - -	125	0	0
M. J. Gulley, lock-keeper -	24	6	8
D. Morgan, Collector and lock-keeper - -	56	0	0
C. Hogan, collector and lock-keeper - -	33	6	8
P. Bushell, lock-keeper - -	13	10	0

(Bushell's pension has been suspended, as he has regained his health and has been re-employed at his own request.)

The largest gratuity which the rules permit has been granted to M'Conkey, and I am not prepared to make an exception in his case to the unbroken practice of treating overseers on the Shannon Navigation as not entitled to pension.

Ancient National Monuments in Ireland.

Mr. HAZELTON (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland will he state what is the annual sum allocated to the preservation of ancient and national monuments in Ireland and administered by the Commissioners of Public Works; from what source this sum is derived; and whether he will issue a detailed statement showing the manner in which this annual sum is expended.

Mr. McKENNA: The sum necessary for the preservation of ancient monuments is voted by Parliament and varies according to the estimated requirements of the year. For 1906–7 the sum inserted in the Estimate for Public Works, etc., Ireland is £351. The sum applicable to national monuments consists of the income derived from dividends on Consolidated Stock held by the Board of Works. For each of the two years to 31st March 1906 the amount of this income was £873 9s. 4d. In 1904–5—the last year for which I have information—the expenditure on ancient monuments was £516 6s 2d., and on national monuments £870 12s. 0d. I will furnish the hon. Member privately with statements of the detailed allocation of these sums, which are too long to be given in an Answer.

Irish Signatures on Post Office Orders.

Mr. EDWARD BARRY (Cork County, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that the postmaster of Skibbereen on 18th May refused to cash a post office order signed by Aine Ui Aunrachain, because she signed her name in Irish; whether steps will be taken to compel such men to accept signatures in Irish; and whether in future appointments of postmasters, especially in Irish-speaking districts, a knowledge of Irish will be an essential qualification.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON: I regret to find that a clerk at the Skibbereen Post Office refused to pay the order in question under a misapprehension as to the rules on the subject which permit payment where there is no difficulty in identification of the payee. The order was presented again on the 7th June and duly paid; and an apology was subsequently tendered to the payee for the mistake.

Mr. Justice Grantham.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) asked the Prime Minister whether he proposed to give a day for the discussion of the Motion of the hon. Member for South Donegal, relating to the conduct of the hearing of the Yarmouth election petition by Mr. Justice Grantham.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): Perhaps I may be allowed, in justice to the Prime Minister, to say that when I presented the memorial to him some three weeks ago, he most kindly acceded to the request for a day, but, of course, I did not press for any particular day.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling Burghs): It is very difficult to find a day for a stray subject such as this, at this period of the session, but we think of devoting Friday fortnight to the Motion. The delay that has already occurred has been necessary because it is essential that the House should be in possession of the printed notes of what took place at the trial.

LORD R. CECIL: Do the Government contemplate interrupting the proceedings on the Committee stage of the Education Bill in order to take this Motion about the conduct of Mr. Justice Grantham?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Education Bill is not put down for Friday.

LORD R. CECIL: Is it not intended to take that Bill on any Friday?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I can give no pledge as to that. At present it is not put down for any Friday.

MR. LEA (St. Pancras, E.) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would also cause the official notes of the Bodmin election petition to be circulated.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): Circulate a copy of Mr. Justice Grantham's speech!

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): With the tears thrown in.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Speaker has not yet received the Report in that case.

The Unemployed Bill.

MR. KEIR HARDIE (Merthyr Tydvil): Can the Prime Minister now say when the Unemployed Bill will be introduced.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am afraid I cannot say anything definite. I have said a good deal that is indefinite already. The subject is not being lost sight of, and I fully expect ere long to be able to move in the matter.

MR. KEIR HARDIE: Before this section of the session ends?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Oh, I think so.

Errors in Voting.

MR. MURPHY explained that during the late sitting that morning he had voted in the "No" lobby under the impression that a division was being taken on the closure. After he had passed the tellers he discovered that the Committee were voting on an Amendment relating to Part IV. of the Education Bill. He thought then that it would be possible for him to vote in the "Aye" lobby and get the clerk to strike out his name from the list of "Noes." He therefore went through the "Aye" lobby and came back immediately and informed the clerk, who told him—as he might have known he would—that he could do nothing. He therefore took the first opportunity to inform the Speaker. He regretted extremely that he should have committed this error, and his only explanation was that in the desire to do right he did wrong. He would be obliged if the Speaker would strike his name out of the "No" list and add it to the "Ayes."

*MR. SPEAKER: The division list will be altered in accordance with the desire of the hon. Member.

MR. VINCENT KENNEDY: I desire to say that I also voted in both lobbies about half-past two o'clock, and the only explanation I can offer is that I did it by inadvertence.

*Mr. SPEAKER said that if the hon. Member would inform the clerks what the particular division was it would facilitate the correction of the lists.

EDUCATION (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. Emmott (Oldham) in the Chair.]

Clause 2:—

Lord R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) moved to insert the word "educational" before the word "trust" in Sub-section (b). He said he hoped the Government would see its way to accept the Amendment which was of some importance. Trusts which affected a school were of two kinds. There were trusts which were educational and trusts which were not educational but charitable, and these latter were generally connected with some religious body. What he wished to submit was that if it were true that schools could be carried on as public elementary schools with trusts which were other than educational in their character, then those trusts should be preserved at all costs. The point he ventured to make was really an important one; it was whether they were right to over-ride, for the purposes of the Bill, trusts which were strictly religious or charitable in character. He was sure the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Education would see that quite different considerations applied to such trusts.

The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of EDUCATION (Mr. Birrell, Bristol, N.) replied that under the general scheme of the Bill the acquisition of school houses by local authorities was limited to the purposes of public elementary schools. Whilst the local authority was in possession of the school for the purpose of carrying out the work of a public elementary school it would not be hampered by any trust whatever. It would be dangerous to strike a distinction in the way indicated by the noble Lord between one trust and another. The only usage the public authority would have of the premises would be that of a public elementary school, and no trust of a religious character would in any way be affected, because the use of the premises for the purpose of such trust would be altogether outside the purposes for which the local education authority would require them.

Lord R. CECIL said he was very much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for his reply, but he did not think he had really met his point, because the framing of the clause was such as to leave it entirely in the discretion of the local authority. Let them take the case of a school used as a chapel on Sunday, and assume a hostile local authority or a local authority of a red tape description which came into the school and saw certain fittings and arrangements. He had in his mind a particular school in Sussex which was used for the purposes of a chapel, and he did not see anything to prevent their saying that that was inconsistent with their conception of what a school ought to be for the purposes of education, and they would be entitled to take away all the fittings which were necessary as a chapel in order to fit it for educational purposes. As long as they only took away things which had to do with education then, from the standpoint of this clause, he did not object at all; but he wished very much—and he attached great importance to the point—to limit the discretion of the local authority to the particular class of business with which they ought to interfere. He understood that the right hon. Gentleman did not object to the insertion of the word "educational," except that he distrusted the legal profession and was not quite sure what interpretation might be given to an innocent word by an unduly ingenious lawyer. He therefore asked him if he could not accept the word. He could not believe that anybody had any objection to it in principle, and he believed it would save the consciences of a considerable number of people.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) said that the previous clause gave absolute unchecked power to the local authority to deal with any fittings or make any alterations they deemed necessary for the school, and he did not think the Amendment would effect the noble Lord's point.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Whiteley and Mr. J. A. Pease.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool) moved to omit the words " or in any way restrict their full control of the schools " at the end of Sub-section (b). The words did not appear to be necessary to strengthen the sub-section, and he thought it lay on those who had framed the Bill to justify their retention. The sub-section was perfectly clear and sufficient without the words. Surely the right hon. Gentleman could trust the local education authority to make a suitable bargain with the owners of a school without pinning them down in this way. Of course, it was perfectly right and proper that a trust should be so far changed and modified that a public elementary school could be carried on, but why put in words which were perfectly superfluous? The local education authority might make such alterations in the internal arrangements of a building as to render it unfit to be used on Saturday or Sunday for parochial or denominational purposes. The clause enabled the local authority to put up big divisions in the schoolroom which might make it absolutely unsuitable as a place for holding a public meeting, or any meeting at all.

Amendment proposed—

" In page 2, lines 5 and 6, to leave out the words ' or in any way restrict their full control of the school.' "—(Mr. Ashley.)

Question proposed, " That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

MR. DILLON said these words ought to be left out, but his reason for saying so was not the same as that given by the hon. Member who moved the Amendment. The hon. Member had made the common mistake of confounding the word " school" with the word " schoolhouse." Sub-section (a) dealt with the building, and gave the local authority full power to make the very alterations the hon. Member was afraid of. Sub-section (b) dealt with the school as an entity apart from the building.

MR. BIRRELL indicated assent.

MR. DILLON said he saw that the right hon. Gentleman accepted his interpretation. If these words were left in this sub-section he thought a subsequent Amendment of which the right hon. Gentleman had given notice would be out of order. The right hon. Gentleman himself recognised the necessity for some qualification of the clause, and he was going to propose to add: "Nothing in this section shall prevent the granting or requiring of facilities for special religious instruction in accordance with this Act, or prevent a local education authority as a condition of an arrangement made under this section with respect to the use of the schoolhouse of an existing voluntary school, from giving an undertaking to give religious instruction which does not conflict with Section 14 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, in the school." He suggested that the right hon. Gentleman, if he did not decide to leave out the words to which the Amendment referred, should introduce some saving words so that his subsequent Amendment might be in order.

MR. BIRRELL said that the hon. and learned Member for Oxford University had pointed out to him the other day that the words "full control of the schools," might possibly interfere with the full effect of the facilities under Clause 3. He had at once acceded to the hon. and learned Member's view, whether he was right or wrong. He himself was advised that the hon. and learned Gentleman was wrong, but that was a secret. The first part of the Amendment, which appeared on the Paper that day in his name, he thought had got over the difficulty suggested by the hon. Member for East Mayo. He had no objection to the words "save as hereinafter provided" being added in order to make assurance doubly sure. "School" referred to the operation and work of the school, and not to the actual bricks and mortar. It was desirable that the local authorities, when they entered into an agreement, should have full control of the work of the school, and that was the reason why these words were put into the clause, and that they should not be allowed to fetter themselves by any restriction which would interfere with their rights to use the school premises of the public elementary schools. He did not think that it would be wise to omit the words altogether. The local education authority should not be allowed to better themselves, but he was quite prepared to accept the words suggested by his hon. friend in order to put it in proper order.

MR. DILLON: Does the right hon. Gentleman accept the words "or in any way which may be hereinafter provided"?

MR. BIRRELL was understood to assent.

LORD BALCARRES asked if the acceptance of the words "hereinafter provided" in any way conflicted with the purpose of delegation suggested by Clause 26.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON said that his view was that the facilities given under Clauses 3 and 4 might be regarded as inconsistent with the provision that these schools should be treated as provided schools. But he recognised that his difficulty had been met by the right hon. Gentleman. As to the last words of the clause he asked whether it would not be worth while to consider that there were a number of people in the country whom those words concerned, who had extraordinary ingenuity in raising difficulties. He did not aim at limiting the control of the local authorities as long as it extended merely to the time for the use of the school as a public elementary school. But there might also be cases in which something might be done by the local authorities in trenching on the rights of the owners of the schools, who might find their powers as to the use of the schools more limited than was necessary to ensure the rights of the local authority.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS (Westminster) said it seemed to him that the words of the clause as they stood gave to the local authority more power over the schools than was really intended. It would remove any ambiguity if these words were left out.

Lord R. CECIL said he could not but help thinking with the hon. Member for East Mayo that the effect of the clause as it stood would be to allow the local authorities to do anything they liked with the schoolhouses. Suppose there were pictures in the schoolhouse which the local education authority thought were superstitious, and wanted to remove them. There a difficulty would arise; and he asked the right hon. Gentlemen to consider this question from that point of view.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. RAWLINSON (Cambridge University) thought that if the Amendment he now proposed to move were accepted it would put an end to all doubts upon the point. He did not wish to repeat what had been said in the previous debate, but he was sure that those who were in charge of the Bill would see the difficulty of using the word "school" in different ways. It was no doubt perfectly right for the President of the Board of Education to say that what he meant was the entity, but there was no such use of the English language in the Bill to indicate that what was meant was the entity. He thought it would be safer therefore to accept the wording of his Amendment.

"In page 2, line 6, at end insert the words 'house during the time during which it is being used by the local education authority.'"

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the BOARD of EDUCATION (Mr. Lough, Islington, W.) said it was quite clear that, under the clause as it stood, the local authority could only get control of the schoolhouse during school hours, and under these circumstances the local authority had not and could not, except by going outside the provisions of the Bill, get any control over the schoolhouse except during the time in which it was handed over to them. That being so, he thought the acceptance of the Amendment would mean undue complication, and, in his judgment, it was quite unnecessary.

*Mr. TALBOT (Oxford University) said he had on the Paper an Amendment to add the words "as a public elementary school" at the end of the sub-section. He suggested that if the hon. Member for Cambridge University would consent to the insertion of his words at the end of his Amendment, the matter would be made quite clear. He would move the insertion of his words as an Amendment to the Amendment. What he desired was to make it clear that during the school days the local authority should have control, but for the rest of the days which were not school days the owners and managers should have ample and complete use for other purposes.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment—

"At end, to add the words 'as a public elementary school.'"

Question, "That those words be there added," put and agreed to.

Question proposed, "That the words, as amended, be there added."

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Sir W. Robson, South Shields) said it seemed to him that the hon. Gentlemen who were responsible for the Amendment as it now stood would by endeavouring to meet a non-existent danger create a real danger. The wording of the sub-section was to the effect that the local education authority should have full control of the school when it was conducted as a public elementary school. The preceding sub-section dealt with school houses as such, but the sub-section they were at present discussing referred to the management of the school. If the Amendment were accepted, it would strike the word "school" out of the section, and in its place insert the word "schoolhouse," which would make the sub-section apply not to the management of the school but to the management of the schoolhouse.

Sir WILLIAM ANSON said what they, on the Opposition side of the House, wanted to ensure, was that the local education authority should not be able to say that owing to any ambiguity of wording they had some right to use the school otherwise than as a public elementary school.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY (Kent, Ashford) said the wording of the sub-section was not quite clear, owing to the use of the two words "schoolhouse" and "school." If hon. Members would refer to a paper which had been issued last week by the County Council of Kent, giving a description of the schools in that county, they would find that time after time the trusts were constituted in connection with the schoolhouse. Unless, therefore, they got rid of the trusts under this sub-section they had not got rid of them under any sub-section. It was not sufficient to say they were not merely dealing with the entity; they could not leave out of consideration the trusts which affected the schoolhouse itself.

MR. DILLON thought the introduction of the words which hon. Members desired would injure instead of improving the rights of school owners. The sub-section dealt not with the schoolhouse, but with the use of the school, which was a totally different matter. That was the purpose of the clause, and therefore the only purpose of the sub-section was to deal with the use of the schoolhouse for the purposes of carrying on a public elementary school. The section was designed to get rid of the right of the owner to break in and hold a bazaar during the school hours. He thought the point was absolutely clear.

MR. BIRRELL said he was perfectly satisfied with the clause as it stood, as it seemed to him to be most suitable for the purposes they had in view.

MR. RAWLINSON said all he desired was to prevent interference with the schoolhouse out of school hours. The words of the sub-section were very wide, and needed restricting.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) said the Government had been more careful to provide for the absolute supremacy of the local education authority during school hours than to protect the owners out of school hours. If the Government would put in words to redress the balance, he thought it would probably satisfy his hon. friends.

DR. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N) pointed out that the wording of sub-section (1) clearly indicated that the local education authority was to have full control of the school only for the purposes of a public elementary school.

MR. BIRRELL said he had no objection whatever to the insertion of the words "as a public elementary school." They were all over the clause already. One thing was made perfectly plain, and that was that the only purpose of this clause was to put the local education authority in possession of the schoolhouse for a limited time for a limited purpose. But to oblige the hon. Member for Oxford University—a thing he was always very anxious to do—he would consent to the addition of those words.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

"In page 2, line 6, at end, to add the words 'as a public elementary school.'"—(Mr. Talbot.)

Question—"That those words be there added"—put, and agreed to.

*MR. AUSTIN TAYLOR (Liverpool, East Toxteth) said the Amendment he desired to move ran as follows —

> "And save so far as any stipulation which may be made for giving in the schools such Christian teaching as may be given in the schools under Section 14 of the Elementary Education Act of 1870."

He moved that Amendment because he thought it would very much facilitate the working of the Bill, and in addition allow the owners of the voluntary schools and the local education authorities to embark on special facilities two days a week; it would also permit them to agree as to giving such Christian teaching as was permitted under the Cowper-Temple clause. If the Amendment was accepted by the Government the owners and trustees of voluntary schools would have the power of insisting upon this teaching. If they did not use the power they could not afterwards complain that the schools were irreligious schools seeing that they had not asserted their power to make them religious. But if they did use this power they would then demonstrate the fact that the objection to the Cowper-Temple teaching was not nearly so deep-seated in the Church of England as it was made to appear by bishops, clergy, and such of the laity as sympathised with them in an extreme form of opposition to the Bill. It might be held by some sections of the House that this was interfering with the absolute discretion of the local education authority. He had every confidence in the local education authority in the matter of religious instruction, and he believed the overwhelming majority of local education authorities would continue to give that kind of religious instruction which was permissible on all days other than those earmarked for special facilities. But he was inclined to think that the local education authorities would be very willing to have the power to make this bargain; that it should no longer be a matter of discretion whether in these schools there should be religious instruction or not, but that if it could be done it should be a definite bargain between these schools and the local authority that for all time, so far as there could be permanency in these matters, simple Christian teaching such as was permitted under the Act of 1870 should be part and parcel of the agreement between them. The power which he desired to give by this Amendment was perfectly clear to the Committee, and therefore he need not labour the point. It did not impose anything in a statutory sense, but left the owners of voluntary schools and the local education authorities free to enter into a bargain one with the other not merely for facilities but for the continuation of simple Christian teaching under the Cowper-Temple clause. He believed those among whom he sat, who represented the large Nonconformist bodies in this country, would agree that those bodies did desire to continue Bible teaching in their schools. If they desired, therefore, to continue it in their present schools they would desire to continue it in the schools taken over by the local education authorities from the churches. The acceptance of the Amendment would strengthen the Bill from a national point of view. He believed the Cowper-Temple teaching in our large towns had been very largely the work of the denominations themselves. He could speak certainly for Liverpool, where the representatives of the various denominations who fought hard for supremacy on the school board, when they found they could not carry out their own ideas, fell back in despair on their common Christianity with most excellent results. It was in order that there might be a continuation of this excellent policy that he now appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to say that an option should be given to the local education authorities and the owners of voluntary schools to enter into this bargain. He moved.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 6, at the end of the second sub-section, to add, 'And save so far as any stipulation which may be made for giving in the schools such Christian teaching as may be given in the schools under Section 14 of the Elementary Education Act of 1870.'"

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

LORD R. CECIL asked whether this Amendment was in order. He pointed out that in the body of the subsection it said—

"Free from any trusts or conditions which are not consistent with the conduct and management of the school as a public elementary school."

The Cowper-Temple clause was not inconsistent with the teaching of an elementary school.

*THE CHAIRMAN said it was for that reason that he ruled this Amendment out of order at the previous point. But the sub-section went on to say, "or in any way restrict the full control of the school." He thought the additional stipulation now proposed might restrict the full control of the school. It was a fine point, but he thought the Amendment was in order.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY: Would it not be equally in order for the Minister for Education to move his proviso now?

*THE CHAIRMAN: No.

DR. MACNAMARA said he could not imagine any managers making that demand, because they did not believe in it. The local authority might make a demand, but then they would have denominational teaching side by side with Cowper-Temple teaching, which was a perfectly impossible proposition. The proposal put down by the President of the Board of Education was a much more feasible one, because it did not lay down any compulsion. He thought the Amendment would be entirely unworkable, for they could not have Roman Catholic teaching, for instance, going on side by side with Cowper-Temple teaching.

MR. BIRRELL said he hoped the hon. Member for East Toxteth would see his way to withdraw his Amendment, because the Government could not accept it, and his object would be met by the Government proposal.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he was in favour of the view expressed by the Minister for Education in his Amendment, which was that there should be freedom on the part of the owners of the schools to make arrangements with regard to religious education. He thought it was just one of those cases in which the phrases "Cowper-Templeism" and "simple Bible teaching" and the rest of it were liable to the greatest misuse and produced the gravest misunderstanding. If he were the owner—as he was not—of a school and if he had to make a bargain with a local authority, he would strive to get teaching consistent with Section 14 of the Act of 1870, but by no means in conformity with that rather jejune instruction which went by the name of Cowper-Templeism. If he were the owner of a voluntary school he should try to get some arrangement which would suit not only Churchmen but all bodies of Christians in the district and not confine it to what was sometimes called Cowper-Templeism, the fatal ambiguity of which phrase was always leading them astray both in this House and outside it. He thought it was most desirable that under such an arrangement full liberty should be given to the voluntary schools.

*MR. AUSTIN TAYLOR asked leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

The Chairman called upon Mr. Middlemore.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he desired on a point of order to remind the Chairman that Clauses 3 and 4 would be discussed under great difficulties by this Amendment.

MR. DILLON asked if he might move the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. and learned Member for North Louth.†

*THE CHAIRMAN: That Amendment is not in order. It deals with the rights of children attending those schools, and therefore it is a matter of attendance and not schoolhouses.

MR. DILLON said they had had a long discussion in which they had all agreed that this particular sub-section did not deal with schoolhouses but with the conduct of the school, and in that respect he submitted that the marginal note was wrong, or at any rate open to correction.

*THE CHAIRMAN: Of course I cannot lay much stress upon the marginal note, but I do lay stress upon the general scope of the clause, which has nothing to do with the attendance of children. Although I should be glad to have the point discussed, I really cannot allow it here.

MR. MIDDLEMORE (Birmingham, N.) said this sub-section proposed to invalidate trusts, or at any rate the religious part of them. The particular sub-section which he moved to omit invited trustees to take part in invalidating trusts which it was their duty to protect, and therefore it invited them to do an act of great wickedness and treachery. These persons had accepted their trusteeship and had signed a document to say that they would maintain those trusts, and now they were being invited to do something in opposition to their written word. This was adding insult and almost infamy to what was little short of robbery. John Stuart Mill laid down the principle that a trust should be maintained as long as the foresight of the person who founded it could be reasonably supposed to extend. Now they were proposing to ask trustees to be parties to this confiscation. He felt very strongly on this point, and he begged to move his Amendment.

† The Amendment referred to was as follows:—"In Clause 2, page 2, line 6, at end, to insert, 'Provided that, after a school has been transferred, the children of parents belonging to a denomination in respect of which a trust existed affecting such school may continue as of right to attend same from any part of an urban or rural area.'"—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

"In page 2, line 7, to leave out sub-section (2)."—(Mr. Middlemore.)

Mr. BIRRELL said that although the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Birmingham had been moved in a spirit of fairness, it was really inconsistent with the observations which had already been made by hon. Gentlemen opposite, who recognised that it was impossible to carry out the proposals made under the Act of 1902 if there was not a latitude allowed in regard to these trusts, so far as they related to the use which the local education authority might make of the schoolhouse and premises for the purpose of carrying on a public elementary school. If they could not vary these trusts there would be an end of all dealing with trust property for public purposes. The whole history of this country was full of instances in which for the public good Parliament had allowed an interference with trusts affecting particular pieces of property. If they were now to be told that they could not acquire for the purposes of public elementary education any building which had a trust deed attached to it there would be no course open to them but to disregard those buildings and leave the local authority free to build new schools, leaving those trust schools out in the cold altogether. That was not the proposal of the Government. Their proposal was that where an agreement could be come to, the persons should strike a bargain of their own, and he did not see any compulsion in that. He sympathised with hon. Members who felt so keenly on this point, but it was now too late in the day for anyone who supported the Bill of 1902 or the Charitable Trusts Act to say that these trusts should not be varied. One hon. Member had assured the Committee that this interference with trusts would interfere in the future with benefactors, and that pious founders would not leave any of their property to trusts. He was afraid that personally he should never be a pious founder, but he could conceive nothing more likely to promote benefactions than the conviction that hundreds of years after the would-be benefactor was dead the public would by law utilise to the utmost the intention he had in his mind. He believed that if these pious founders could ever revisit the country the persons they would admire most would be the Charity Commissioners, because they would see the schools they had founded, instead of being kept going with only two or three boys, revived in consequence of these very breaches of trust and devoted to the main purposes which the pious founders had in view. He knew nothing more likely to encourage public benefactions than the fact that there was power from time to time to see to it that the trusts were not used as an instrument in opposition to the public good, but to divert them into channels of public usefulness. His belief was that the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Birmingham was entirely hostile to the general purposes of the Bill and would render this or any other measure dealing with private trusts altogether impossible. Therefore the Government could only offer a determined opposition to the Amendment.

*Mr. EVELYN CECIL (Aston Manor) said the speech of the Minister for Education was entirely alien to anything he had heard before on this subject, and he could not understand his view. He said it would not damp the ardour of pious founders and benefactors, but he differed from the right hon. Gentleman on that point. Probably in many cases the opinions of pious founders as to what was for the public good might differ very much from the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman. The President of the Board of Education had just put before the Committee a very dangerous doctrine. He happened to be the happy possessor of a book written by the right hon. Gentleman upon the liabilities of trusts and trustees in which it was laid down that the duty of a trustee was to adhere to the terms of his trust in all things great and small, important and seemingly unimportant—

> "This was his very plainest duty; no trustee would ever deny it, or pretend to be ignorant of it, yet it was his hardest, unless from the very beginning he made up his mind to it, and then it was as easy as eating bread and butter. Non possumus (continued the right hon. Gentleman) was the one and only answer for badgered trustees. They should never argue or reply to arguments, but barricade themselves behind their will or their deed, and whilst profoundly regretting their inability to oblige, refuse to budge a foot."

This was on pages 22 and 23.

MR. BIRRELL said they were not now dealing with the obligations of trustees, because every trustee left to himself must carry out his trust. They were now considering a great measure of public interest.

*MR. EVELYN CECIL said there had never before been such a wide departure in so-called deference to the public good. He could not himself see any very great difference between a private trustee and one who was a trustee for the nation.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend) said that during the whole of the discussion upon the Act of 1902 he did not venture to say a word concerning education. He ventured this afternoon to address himself to this particular question of trusts because he did not think it was too late for him to enter his protest against what he believed to be an injustice on the part of the Government in dealing with trusts. The Minister for Education had said that the action of this or any Government which dealt with the alteration of trusts was to prevent abuses, to destroy what might be called the injury of obsoleteness which crept into trusts, and to keep down all that repressed what was for the public good. There was a time when a great many hon. Members opposite did not take the view that trusts were, as they had done their best to represent, oppressive to the public good. The whole body of opinion in this country forty years ago was that these religious and educational trusts were of immense benefit to the community at large. He quoted an extract from a Minute of the Committee of the Council on Education o 1844, which stated that the trust deeds of voluntary schools would form a permanent record of the views and intentions of the founders of the schools. The Minute further stated that in the opinion of the Committee no plan of education ought to be encouraged in which intellectual instruction was not subordinated to religious instruction. At that time this country was practically dependent upon the Church of England for the education of its children. The example set by the Church of England in the formation of the National Society was followed by the British and Foreign Society, by the Roman Catholics, and by Nonconformists of every kind. The Church of England gave their support generally and specifically to every effort which was made then to build up the religious foundations which existed to-day. He did not think the Minister for Education had put quite fairly before the Committee and the country the position of the teaching in the voluntary schools as they existed in this country. Were the Government justified in dealing so rigorously with trust deeds at the present time? Hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House believed that the treatment was too rigorous. They believed that the Government had taken from the voluntary schools that which was of most good in them, namely, religious instruction, the one thing for which those schools were valued. It was proposed to take away the full teaching which was provided under the old system and to give instead teaching on two days of the week. The instruction issued to the inspectors in former days was that they were to have regard less to the intellectual development of the children than to the foundation of character formed upon religious teching. The inspectors were told that no intellectual development was sound which had not its origin in moral and religious teaching through doctrinal methods. The people of this country had gone a long way since then, but he was not at all certain that they were on the right way. He did not think that those who represented nonconformity at present were really doing justice to themselves and their own history. There was not a single member of the community who had not benefited directly from the teaching given in the voluntary schools. In the forties and fifties, when there was no other system of schools, the burden of educating the poor devolved upon the Church of England. The Government then not only encouraged but pressed benevolent people to give land and to give of their riches in order to give to the poor of the country the education which they had not previously. He urged that the trusts should have greater consideration at the hands of the Government. Nonconformity and the Liberal Party were not at present really representing the feelings of the classes from which they had drawn their political force and power. The clauses in the Bill were repressive; they did not give freedom; they did not represent the views of the vast body of the people of the country. The Minister for Education had been more moved by political opportunism than by what he himself honestly believed was for the best good of the country. If the right hon. Gentleman were only to embody in the Bill the statements he had made on public platforms they would have less quarrel with him. The right hon. Gentleman knew that he was not carrying out the policy which he and his leader and the Liberal Party presented to the country at the general election. He hit harder than probably he meant, and by the clause which practically defeated the intention of the founders of the trusts, he was retarding the development of the education of the country. They had come to the day of misappropriations, and these, although called by another name by the Minister for Education, would return upon the Party which they represented and would do it an injury which they did not desire; because he believed they really wished to do their best for the good of the children of the country. What he and those associated with him desired was that a spirit of benevolence and charity in regard to education should be kept alive; that the soul and the mind of the children should be cultivated, and that no education other than that was worthy of the name. They believed that the inculcation of morality was good, but that the upbringing of the children in religion was better. They believed that the same tests in regard to the religious development of the child should be applied as to its intellectual development. It was in that regard that he hoped the intentions of the pious founders of trusts for the spiritual welfare of the children of England would be maintained intact.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Sir W. ROBSON, South Shields) said that the speeches in support of this Amendment displayed a singular and unfortunate misconception of the nature of trusts. They had been spoken of as if they were self-supporting trusts and as if the Government were interfering with the will of some pious founder who had set apart a sufficient fund for a charitable purpose. There could be no greater misapprehension. The trusts they were dealing with were not self-supporting. They were trusts which came as petitioners to the national exchequer for money. Most of them were built upon the legislative understanding that 50 per cent. of the expenses should be contributed by the denomination, and that it should receive a grant of 50 per cent. from the State. The denominations found themselves unequal to that financial burden, and their friends strove by legislative action to lessen that burden. He did not complain of that, but it was idle for voluntary schools to put themselves into the position of private trusts and to say the State had no right to dictate or suggest terms on which it should give its money. On the one hand, the denominations were appealing to the State for financial aid and on the other hand the State was saying in this Bill on what terms it would give that aid. No parallel could be drawn between that case and the case of private trusts. The denominations complained of the intolerable strain upon them, and that being their position how preposterous it was for them to assail the Government with terms of abuse because in the strict fulfilment of their duty as public trustees they suggested that there were terms which ought to be imposed in common fairness to the community which had to pay.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON said he objected to the language that had been used in respect to trustees and the sanctity of trusts. The President of the Board of Education had adduced the argument that because the Charity Commissioners had altered the disposition of certain trusts to the advantage of education, the benefactors who had created those trusts would have been heartily grateful to the Legislature for empowering them to do so. But it should be remembered that in those cases the educational circumstances of the past were adapted to the needs of the present with as little change as possible and the rule of çi-près was observed. The right hon. Gentleman had also quoted the action of the late Government in the Bill of 1902 and had stated that his right hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition had invaded trusts and that, therefore, he was not in a position to criticise any one else who invaded trusts in any other direction. But what did the late Government do? In the first place they altered the schemes of management under the trust deed so as to conform to the provision of the Act; but the whole scheme of management was most carefully worked out to secure that the original intentions of the truster were carried on. He admitted that there was an invasion of the trusts under what was known as the Kenyon-Slaney clause of the Act of 1902. He quite agreed that when the late Government took the control of the religious instruction from the rector or vicar and deposited it in the hands of the managers that was a departure from the terms of the trust. But it was never contemplated to alter the character of the religious instruction given in the schools. Lastly, in regard to the teachers, it was a departure from the terms of the trust which enabled managers to appoint all the teachers, except the headmaster, from any religious denomination whatever. That was the whole case in regard to trusts as against the late Government. But what did the present Bill do? It altered the whole purpose for which the voluntary schools had been built. The Solicitor-General had said that these schools demanded payment from the State. But what were the circumstances of the case? Had not the State been content to use the buildings of the schools? Had not Parliament encouraged the denominations to build these schools, because Parliament did not want to put the expense either on the Exchequer or on the local rates? They were not mendicants for public money. They were the inheritors of buildings for purposes which could not be carried out under this Bill. But as the Bill now stood schools might be rejected and put aside and not allowed to be used as public elementary schools unless they submitted to the requirements of the Bill in regard to the trusts. It was not fair to put the case in the way in which the Solicitor-General had done and say that they had clamoured to have their schools confiscated. The purport of the Amendment was that the schools whose managers desired they should remain as public elementary schools should be acquired as such with the least possible departure from their trust deeds. What he meant was that they should if they chose continue their useful mission and should not be thrown aside through the whim of the local authority. He quite admitted that the Amendment was one which the Government could not consistently admit, having regard to the scheme of Clause 2, but for himself, he was, he thought justified in protesting against the treatment to which trusts were subjected throughout the Bill. The language of the Bill indicated that the Government were only too ready to secure, as public property, schools which had been provided for the purposes of the State in order to secure religious education in conjunction with elementary education. Whatever happened under the clause, however, a breach of trust would have to be committed, and against that he entered his hearty protest.

Mr. DILLON said the course of the discussion appeared to him to be positively melancholy. They were discussing a provision which was entirely in the interest of the voluntary schools but which it was now proposed to omit. If the Government had proposed the Amendment the hon. Gentlemen who were now supporting it would not have dared to have voted for anything of the kind. The speeches of hon. Members against breaches of trust would come in very well upon Clause 8 and other clauses, but to discuss the question upon this clause was most lamentable, as all that the clause proposed was to put trustees in a position in which they could hand over their schools. The only effect of the Amendment, if adopted, would be to play directly into the hands of the hon. Members who were the extreme opponents of Clauses 3 and 4, as it would give the local authorities a thoroughly valid excuse for refusing to take over voluntary schools. Such a proposal was not in his view reasonable.

MR. RAWLINSON said he was not upon this Amendment going to make an appeal to the Government, as he knew that any such appeal in regard to it would be unfair, because he recognised that this clause was an essential part of the scheme of the Bill. He was prepared, however, to vote in favour of the Amendment, not in the hope that the Government would accept it, but because he recognised that it was against the basis of the measure. He believed that that basis was confiscation of trust property, and the object of the Amendment was to protest against that. The Bill was talked about as if it referred only to trusts created hundreds of years ago, but, as a matter of fact, it referred to trusts ten, fifteen, and twenty years old. The trustees under it were invited to disregard equally the wishes of new and of old benefactors. It was quite a mistake to represent trustees coming as mendicants and suppliants. Under Part II. of the Bill the plunder could not be justified by the plea that the man gave his money merely for educational purposes. There had always been enough money from these educational endowments to pay for the denominational instruction in the schools so endowed. The Minister for Education had scoffed at the idea that the policy of the Government would stop benefactions which would go towards the creation of trust funds in future, but in his experience it had had that effect.

SIR E. CARSON (Dublin University) wished to know whether it was proposed to put in the sub-section provisions imposing an obligation on the trustees to carry out the trust. It must be considerd that a trustee was bound to get the best possible terms. If when this Bill had passed the trustee of a voluntary school failed to secure such facilities as it was possible to secure would that trustee be guilty of a breach of trust? As he read the Bill, he did not think he would, but he thought he ought to be. Therefore he asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he would accept an Amendment limiting the breaking of the trust.

MR. BIRRELL said they had assumed that the trustees and owners of voluntary schools would always make it a condition that they should have the most extended facilities that the law under Clause 3 would permit. He could not suppose that they would do otherwise. However that might be, he would when they came to that part of the Bill, endeavour to put that question right. He only rose for the purpose of making an appeal to the Committee. Everybody had admitted that he could not possibly accept the Amendment now before the Committee; that to do so would be an act of cruelty to those trustees who wished to continue their schools and who wished to have the Prayer Book in the schools twice a week, and a good system of religious education on the other days. This clause was in their favour. However, he did not rise to argue the matter but to ask the Committee, as he could not accept the Amendment, to come to a decision upon it.

*MR. NIELD (Middlesex, Ealing) said that they on the Opposition side of the House were being constantly told that the sanctity of trusts had been broken in upon and practically destroyed by the late Government by their Education Act of 1902 and by the Charitable Trusts Act, but that was not an accurate statement. The Act of 1902 had preserved the object which the founder had in view but had altered the number of trustees and given popular representation, while the Charitable Trusts Act had provided means for modernising trusts while keeping as far as possible to the object and scheme of the founder's bounty. The Minister for Education had also referred to the number of schools which had been surrendered or transferred under this Act of 1870. This was a subject upon which he himself had put a specific Question to the right hon. Gentleman. He asked him specifically to state the number of schools taken over since 1870; to give the number of school places affected, and to state how many of the schools taken over were Roman Catholic, how many were Church of England, and how many belonged to the various Nonconformist bodies. But in the Answer he received, with all the knowledge which he had of the English language, he utterly failed to find any information at all. Throughout the debates upon the Act of 1870 the position of these voluntary schools was clearly defined and not only was their existence recognised but their great work acknowledged. Board schools were to supplement but not supplant them, and upon the faith of this statutory recognition further schools were put up beside them. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University made it abundantly clear that even so far as building grants were given they were given for secular education, and the conditions of those grants had been fulfilled. True, they had to come for larger grants from the Exchequer year by year, and for very good reason, since they were subjected to unfair competition. During the whole of the time that elementary education had been given under the school board system, oppressive and ever increasing rates were levied upon the people for the purpose of providing and equipping in the most complete manner, irrespective of cost, these public elementary and higher grade schools. How could they suppose that voluntary schools could exist side by side with those schools which had the illimitable purse of the ratepayers at their back? It was because of that that the voluntary schools of outlying and rural districts came to the House from time to time to ask for further assistance. It was not only unjust and unfair but departing from the common principles of honesty to say that these great denominations had not a substantial interest in the schools they had built and equipped at such great pecuniary sacrifice, merely because they had received these grants from the Imperial Exchequer, grants given for purposes and under conditions which had been amply, nay generously, fulfilled. If hon. Gentlemen opposite said they had a mandate to deal with any part of the public educational system, it was confined to two points, viz., increasing the number of managers for voluntary schools appointed by the local authority, and the appointment of the head teachers. He denied that they had a mandate to alter trust deeds and put an end to the wishes of the pious founders of the last sixty years, the raison d'être for which was the establishment and maintenance of the religious education to be given in the schools, of the character approved by and in accordance with the teaching of the Church of England. The Committee in this matter were taking a step which they would soon regret because it would open the door to interference with trust deeds of all kind.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman opposite; therefore he would suggest that the Committee should bring this discussion to an end, and that they should divide not on this Amendment but rather on the second Amendment, upon which there were some important Questions to ask.

MR. MIDDLEMORE said before he withdrew his Amendment he would like to reply to the remark of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Education that the pious founders would clap their hands and rejoice at the destruction of these trust deeds. What mysterious power had whispered in the ear of the right hon. Gentleman that he had been enabled to become the Parliamentary representative of the unseen and unknown? All he could say was that the trust deeds were just as much alive now as they were in the time of the pious founders, and he ventured to say that if the pious founders were still alive they would hold the same views as they held when they entered into these trust deeds. He begged leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD BALCARRES said he desired to move the Amendment standing in the name of his hon. friend the Member for the Oxford University—

"To insert in line 10, after the word 'section,' the words 'as far as possible in accordance with the terms of the trust."

His hon. friend had put those words on the Paper in order to invite the President of the Board of Education to say whether he could see his way to accept the Amendment not from the point of view of limiting the discretion of the local authority or the constituted rights and duties of trustees, but merely to insert in the clause something in the nature of a safeguard.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 10, after the word 'section,' to insert the words 'as far as possible in accordance with the terms of the trust.'"—(Lord Balcarres.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. BIRRELL said, after all, under this clause the owners were the people who had to carry out the arrangements, and they would make their proposals as far as possible consistent with their trust. But he did not like to accept any words which might prevent the local authority from obtaining control of the schools during the time for which they required them.

SIR E. CARSON said the matter was of considerable importance, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would see his way to agree to the Amendment. The object was to prevent negligent trustees or people upon whom pressure might be put from abrogating more than was necessary their functions as trustees of denominational schools. Surely it was only fair that a trustee should be guilty of a breach of trust if he neglected to carry out all the arrangements allowed under the Bill for the purpose of securing special facilities for religious teaching. What was the use of saying that a trustee was to be absolved from a breach of trust if he got rid of a trust altogether? In the vast majority of cases there was no doubt the owner and trustee would make the best bargain they could with the local authority. But the trust might pass into the hands of persons who were absolutely careless in these matters, and care ought to be taken that they were not allowed in such cases to sacrifice what the right hon. Gentleman had given them in the Bill. They should be bound to exercise the ordinary prudence and duties of trustees.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY (Kent, Ashford) asked the right hon. Gentleman to give further consideration to this matter. No harm could result from the Amendment, and it would provide that the trusts should be varied as little as was consistent with the arrangements in carrying out the other parts of the clause. It was impossible in any way to limit the full effect of the control given by the previous subsection.

MR. BIRRELL said the owners must know their own duties, and they knew perfectly well the limited purpose for which they were allowed to put their trust on one side. The Amendment would throw doubt upon their action in every possible way. He thought they must leave it to the trustees and the other persons who represented them to look after the matter as far as possible.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he was sorry the right hon. Gentleman had taken the line he had. The words proposed to be inserted in the clause had no other object than to make it quite clear that no unnecessary sacrifice should be made by the trustees. The right hon. Gentleman had not suggested a single inconvenience that would result. He had only suggested some minute difficulty which might arise, but he had not given even an imaginary case. He believed these words would be a valuable guide to the trustees and would help them in any legitimate discussion with the local authority. He did not want to hamper the local authority, and indeed they could not hamper it as the responsible authority in matters of education. If these words were not inserted it would seem to many trustees, as indeed it would seem to many in the Committee, that the Government desired to sweep away the trusts and to treat them as a matter of no moment, and being content that the local authorities should get all that they wanted for their part of the business and leaving the interest of the trust on one side.

LORD R. CECIL very much hoped the Government would reconsider their decision. The Minister for Education seemed to regard it merely as a matter for the owners. He did not think it was. He thought it was mainly a matter for those who benefited under the trust, and he could see a very substantial reason why some such words as these should be inserted. The clause said that the owners should have power to carry out any arrangements under this section. It might well be that two different arrangements might be possible under this section, both for the purpose of carrying on the public elementary school, but one might be more and the other less in accordance with the trust, and it seemed to him clearly desirable that in that case the one more in accordance with the trust should be selected by the trustee. But unless some such words as those of the Amendment were inserted the trustees would have absolute liberty to make the arrangement which was less in accordance with the trust. That was a very serious matter, and he could not help thinking that the Minister for Education had not really considered that aspect of the case. Even if the actual words of the Amendment were not those which the Government could accept he hoped they would insert some words which would make it clear that where it was possible to make an alternative arrangement the trustees should make that arrangement which was the more in accordance with the trust.

SIR W. ROBSON said it would be somewhat dangerous to introduce limitations of the power of the trustees to make such arrangements as they thought right with the local authorities. There was no reason to doubt that the trustees would consider themselves in a special sense the guardians of religious education wherever they could fulfil the object of their trusts, but if they were to introduce words of this kind it would certainly cast doubt on the power of trustees to make any arrangements. The words which it was proposed to introduce would leave every trustee and every local education authority in doubt as to the validity of the arrangement at which they had arrived, and that was a matter the Government desired to avoid.

*MR. CLAVELL SALTER (Hants, Basingstoke) confessed he had some difficulty in understanding the reluctance shown by the Government to accept this Amendment in substance. The clause they were dealing with was one which proposed to give to trustees a licence to break a trust. He imagined all Members of the Committee would agree that that was a thing which, i it were done at all, ought to be done with the greatest care and circumspection. He should think the right hon. Gentleman would agree that the only ground on which it could be suggested that it might be right to entitle trustees to break trusts was that of public interest, and did it not follow that licence to break trusts ought to be restricted so far as the public interest allowed? Was this restriction in any way in derogation of the supposed public interest on which the Government relied? Under the clause as it stood it would be competent for the trustees of a voluntary school to make an agreement which would completely destroy the hitherto existing religious character of the school. It might be that they were in a position, if they bargained with the local authority, to obtain certain terms. Under the clause as it stood they would be under no obligation to attempt to obtain the best terms available, and it would be open to the trustees, even though they could obtain facilities by bargaining, to make an agreement which would involve no facilities at all. But under the clause as proposed to be amended it would not be competent for the trustees of the school to make an agreement without stipulating for religious facilities, assuming such facilities could be obtained. He hoped the Minister for Education would consider whether, possibly by some alteration of the words, he could limit the licence here given to break trusts, so far as might be compatible with the public interest.

*SIR FRANCIS POWELL (Wigan) considered the proposal of his hon. friend a valuable one. He thought the trustees and owners were entitled to some instruction and guidance in the matter. There was no doubt that the tendency of these clauses was very unfavourable as they now stood to the maintenance of trusts, and if the Bill passed in its present form it would appear as if the intention of Parliament was to break up trusts. Some Amendment of the kind indicated would do something to remove that defect.

Mr. HORRIDGE (Manchester, E.) said it was exceedingly desirable in this matter that the hands of the local authority and of the trustees should be free. Speaking as a lawyer on this occasion it seemed to him if they put in the words of the Amendment they would at once raise the question whether or not the trustees had gone one iota beyond what was necessary for the purposes of the trust. The Amendment would involve the trustees in all sorts of law suits, and in many cases they might even have the authorities themselves brought in. It seemed to him that the people to be trusted were those who had to make the bargain, and the Committee ought not to limit their actions in any way, or to raise any suspicion. He hoped the Minister for Education would not accept any words of this character, because he believed they would create difficulties and be harmful while serving no useful purpose.

Sir E. CARSON said the hon. and learned Gentleman had stated that unless these words were inserted there might be the suggestion of a breach of trust if certain matters were not carried out, but that was impossible for the reason that the words were "as far as possible in accordance with the terms of the trust." If the local authority said "we will never give you so and so," and the trustee had to accept it, he had done his duty because he had acted as far as possible in accordance with the trust. What they contended was that under the Bill at present the trustee was absolutely absolved from doing anything to carry out his trust, and they wished to have it clear that it was his duty to carry out his trust as far as possible. Why should it not be put in the Bill? In every case he ought to obtain terms for religious liberty under the Bill, and if he tried to do that he was absolved from any idea of any breach of trust whatsoever, because it was covered by the words "as far as possible." This was the most reasonable Amendment that could possibly be suggested, and he could not conceive why any Government should wish to interfere with solemn and great trusts more than was absolutely necessary in the public interest.

Tellers for the Noes—Mr. Whiteley and Mr. J. A. Pease.

Lord R. CECIL moved the omission of the portion of Sub-section 2 which provided that the owners of a schoolhouse of any existing voluntary school which was subject to charitable trusts should, when the local education authority had not the use of the schoolhouse, have power to use it for any purpose they thought fit, subject to any statutory provisions under which the use of the schoolhouse or any room therein might be required for public purposes. The words appeared to him to be indefensible. The purpose of the sub-section was to enable the local education authority to come to terms, in spite of the trust, for the use of the schoolhouse for the purpose of public elementary education, and if the trustees were to have the power which the clause proposed to confer on them, the trusts must to a certain extent be interfered with. The Government had spoken as if this were a matter of affecting principally the trustees, but that was not so. He took very little interest in the trustees, except in so far as they performed the duties of their trusts. From a Return which had been issued showing the trusts affecting schools in Kent it appeared that under the trusts the schoolhouses could be put to a variety of uses of a parochial character, and, generally speaking, for the good and the convenience of the districts in which they existed. These trusts ought to be carefully preserved, and the only purpose of the words which he proposed should be struck out would be to give the trustees liberty to disregard the trusts. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, lines 10 to 15, to leave out the words, 'and in the time during which the local education authority have not the use of the schoolhouse under any such arrangement, to use the schoolhouses for any purposes they think fit, subject nevertheless to any statutory provisions under which the use of the schoolhouse or any room therein may be required for public purposes.' "—(Lord R. Cecil.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

Mr. BIRRELL admitted that the words were unnecessarily wide. They were inserted in good nature, because the Education Office often received requests from trustees to be allowed to use the schoolrooms for social and public purposes, and the Board thought that the clause afforded a good opportunity for giving a general permission to trustees to use the schools for purposes other than educational. He should be sorry to see the words omitted altogether, but he agreed that they were extraneous to the purpose of the Bill. He did not wish in any way to insist on the words "for any purposes they think fit," and he was prepared to modify them. If hon. Gentlemen opposite thought that the whole of the words should go, he could not insist on them, because they were in no way necessary for his purpose.

Sir WILLIAM ANSON said he fully understood and appreciated the motive of the right hon. Gentleman in putting in the words. He suggested that in modifying the clause the right hon. Gentleman might insert words authorising the trustees to use the schoolhouses for purposes not inconsistent with the purposes of the trusts.

Mr. BIRRELL said there was a difficulty about the use of the words "not inconsistent with." In certain cases it might be argued that the purposes for which trustees desired to use schoolhouses were inconsistent with the purposes of the trusts.

Lord R. CECIL said he should prefer the omission of the words. It would not be too much trouble for trustees, desiring to go beyond the trust in the use of the premises, to apply for permission to the Education Office, who could decide each case according to its merits. Though he desired to meet the right hon. Gentleman, he should prefer the words to come out altogether.

Mr. KEIR HARDIE (Merthyr Tydvil) said he wished to ask whether in the event of the words coming out, it would be possible to limit the use of the schools for public purposes.

Mr. ROGERS (Wiltshire, Devizes) said he wanted to ask what would be done with the money which would be paid for the use of these buildings. He himself had had very frequently to pay his guinea for the use of a school in order to hold a meeting with his constituents; and he understood that these guineas were used for the up-keep of the building. But that would not be necessary now, and the revenue from such sources should be treated as part of the education fund.

MR. BIRRELL said that all monies which owners or trustees of schools took as fees for the use of their premises were trust monies; they were bound to be devoted to the purposes of the trust, and the trustees must account for them. The money might be applicable to the maintenance of the furniture of the schools, but the owners or trustees could not apply it for political purposes or put it into their own pockets. He thought it was desirable to have some form of words of a wide character, such as "for any purposes they may think fit," so that the local authorities or the trustees might, without coming to the Board of Education, use the money derived from the letting of the schools for social purposes. He undertook to introduce at a later stage words which, while getting rid of too wide powers, would safeguard some of the objects which had been referred to.

LORD R. CECIL said that after the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman he would ask leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY said he wished to move the omission of sub-section (3) of Clause 2 in order to ascertain from the Government what their intentions were as to the three different categories of voluntary schools mentioned in the Bill.

"In page 2, line 16, to leave out Sub-section (3)."—(Mr. Laurence Hardy.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

MR. LOUGH said that this sub-section was absolutely essential in order to make the clause in harmony with Clause 1; and he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not persist in moving his Amendment.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY said that what he wished to ascertain was why this special provision was put in instead of being covered by a general definition clause.

MR. LOUGH said that that would be dealt with under Clause 4.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY said he would not press his Amendment.

Leave to withdraw Amendment refused.

MR. BIRRELL said that the hon. Member's suggestion was that the object to be obtained by this sub-section would be better obtained by a general interpretation clause; but the draftsmen thought otherwise, and they had made it plain in the substance and body of the Bill.

MR. CAVE (Surrey, Kingston) thought that this was a question of special importance.

SIR E. CARSON inquired where the power to enter into the arrangements referred to was given.

MR. BIRRELL said he had put down, in response to a point raised by the hon. Member for Oxford University, an Amendment which read, "Nothing in this section shall prevent the granting or requiring of facilities for special religious instruction in accordance with this Act, or prevent a local education authority, as a condition of an arrangement made under this section with respect to the use of the schoolhouse of an existing voluntary school, from giving an undertaking to give religious instruction which does not conflict with section fourteen of The Elementary Education Act, 1870, in the school." He thought that met the point.

SIR E. CARSON said that the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman seemed to him to be absolutely inconsistent with the previous part of the Bill.

SIR W. ROBSON argued that there was no inconsistency between the clauses.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY said he had asked leave to withdraw the Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN said he had put the question of the withdrawal and permission had been refused.

Question put.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir Clement Hill and Mr. Fell.

LORD R. CECIL said the Amendment he desired to move was only to carry out what had already been done by the Government in another part of the Bill, in order to guard against the danger alluded to by the hon. Member who moved the last Amendment. He did not know whether the Government had any objection to this Amendment, which was only to make it quite plain that the local authority was not to get any interest in these schools other than for elementary education. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 17, after the word 'shall,' to insert the words 'in respect only of its conduct as a public elementary school by the local education authority, and to the extent only of such conduct.'"—(Lord R. Cecil.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. BUTCHER (Cambridge University) said there was a section in the Act of 1870—Section 23—which corresponded with this Amendment—

"Every school so transferred shall, to such extent, and during such times as the school board have any control over the school, be deemed a school of the school board."

Some such words should be put in here, so that if this Bill was read in conjunction with the Act of 1870 it might not be thought that they had been left out for a particular purpose. He suggested that in order to remove any ambiguity these words should be inserted.

MR. BIRRELL agreed with the noble Lord that these words had already been accepted in other parts of the Bill, and he had no objection to them except they were tautological. He had been advised that there was no danger of in any way creating the impression that the schools were in any sense under the control of the local education authorities except f the purposes of elementary education, and that therefore the words were unnecessary. But he would look into the matter, and if he found his views were in accordance with those of the noble Lord he would insert words to make the matter clear.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. RAWLINSON thought there could be no objection to the Amendment standing in the name of his hon. friend the Member for Oxford University. If the words did no good, they could do no harm to the sub-section. They were to insure that a school should be deemed only during school hours to be a school of the local education authority. The Amendment was only for the purpose of clearing up any ambiguity there might be and it could do no possible harm. He begged to move.

"In page 2, line 18, after the words 'deemed,' to insert the words 'during school hours.'"—(Mr. Rawlinson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR supported the Amendment. It was desirable that on the face of the clause the interest of the local authority should be restricted to the hours for which, for the purposes of elementary education, it had been given. The Government would agree that that was their policy. If that was so, let the policy be placed in the Bill in such a form that the most stupid or the most cantankerous trustee or manager would have the true verities of the case staring him in the face. It would make it clear to the casual and cursory reader, and from a lawyer's point of view it could do no harm. In these circumstances he urged the right hon. Gentleman not to be too hasty in rejecting the Amendment.

MR. BIRRELL said he was advised that they had already by the addition of the words "as a public elementary school" at the end of Sub-section 3, made the matter as plain as it could possibly be made. He could not accept the Amendment, but he would look into the matter again, as he had every desire to make every clause of the Bill as plain as possible, and see if he could so arrange words as to make the details and the verities of the Bill perfectly plain.

SIR E. CARSON said it was quite impossible to understand this kind of controversial objection. The right hon. Gentleman had not said one word as to what really was his objection to the Amendment. Did it not carry out the object of the Bill that the school should only be a provided school during school hours? If that was so, why should not these words be put in? The right hon. Gentleman said the words appeared in other parts of the Bill and that those argued together would give the same result, but there was not a word in the Amendment which would not be in accordance with his own Bill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said it was true that the right hon. Gentleman had accepted an Amendment that limited the use of a school by the local authority to the purposes of elementary education; but he still contended that the control by that body should be limited to the time necessary for carrying out its duties. The Amendment was that the actual duties were to be limited to the school hours. Therefore he thought that whatever ambiguity existed would, at all events, be removed by the acceptance of the Amendment.

LORD R. CECIL said he was afraid the Leader of the Opposition had put the question rather too favourably for the Government. The Amendment which had been moved by the hon. Member for Oxford University and accepted applied to paragraph (b). The operative part of the clause laid down what the general arrangement was to be, and provided for such use of the schoolhouse as was required for the purposes of carrying on a public elementary school. Nothing had been put into the clause to limit that phrase at all, and it might be extended a great deal beyond the use of the schools during school hours. It was a very wide provision, and it appeared to him that it contained nothing which definitely limited the local authority in the extent of the arrangement which they might come to. The matter was a little complicated in the drafting. Although the principle of the Amendment accepted earlier in the afternoon covered this Amendment, the actual enacting words did not do so, and if the Government thought the spirit of that Amendment was to be carried out some such words as those now proposed must be inserted.

MR. DILLON pointed out that the effect of this Amendment might be to prevent the local authority from making necessary alterations or whitewashing the premises or even cleaning them. Such work could not be done in schools hours. If "school" and not "schoolhouse" was meant then there was no necessity to put in the words as they would be inoperative. In his opinion the Amendment had no effect whatever in one sense, and in the other sense it might be held to be taking away what was given in the earlier sub-section.

MR. A. J BALFOUR said that such matters as those raised by the hon. Member for East Mayo would be settled by amicable arrangement. Did the hon. Gentleman desire that the local authority should have the right of entry at all hours? All local authorities and all trustees were not reasonable, and it was necessary that the operations to which the hon. Member had referred should be conducted with some limits. If friction arose it was manifest that these operations outside school hours must be conducted under some kind of regulations, and no regulations appeared to have been provided for. The Minister for Education agreed with the Amendment, but thought it was unnecessary, and for that reason he objected to putting it in the Bill. It was clear to him that there was a point of substance here. He wished to know the view of the Government with regard to reciprocal rights between the trustees and the local authorities.

*Sir FRANCIS POWELL said that allusion had been made to the clause dealing with this subject in the Act of 1870. As a member of the National Society he had had a great deal to do with partial transfers of schools where the education authority were in occupation during school hours and the owners during the rest of the time. His experience was that they had to exercise very great care in drafting those transfer deeds, and that great vigilance was necessary in watching their operation. He urged the Government to pay good heed to this matter and to see that these arrangements were so made as not to act prejudicially to the interests of trustees or owners.

Mr. BIRRELL said that, as the hon. Member for East Mayo had pointed out, it would be impossible to whitewash a school during the hours, say, of religious instruction, or to clean it while the children were undergoing tuition. It would, therefore, be obviously unfair to insert the words "during school hours." They could only lead to a deadlock. He adhered to what he had said, that if he could introduce words which would make the meaning perfectly plain he would do so on Report.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Would the right hon. Gentleman give us his view as to the mutual arrangement of hours?

Mr. BIRRELL said the right hon. Gentleman must understand that, as a matter of business, schools could not be cleaned or prepared for use while school work was going on. Therefore, an arrangement would have to be made under the agreement whereby the local authority would have access for such purposes. He could not imagine the right hon. Gentleman was serious in putting this as a matter of real difficulty.

Sir WILLIAM ANSON doubted whether the provision made in the clause clearly confined the use of the schoolhouse to school hours.

Mr. BIRRELL: We have no desire to obtain possession of these school premises otherwise than for the purpose of elementary schools at such times and seasons and those occasional additional periods as are absolutely necessary for us to carry on the work of education.

*Mr. BURDETT-COUTTS asked what authority there was for the explanation that the words "public elementary school" really did confine the use or control of the schoolhouse to the school hours. Where was that definition of "public elementary school" to be found? Was it in the Bill?

Mr. CHEETHAM (Stalybridge) said that in many districts these schoolhouses were the only buildings in which evening continuation classes which gave secondary education could be held, and therefore it was very important that they should be safeguarded under the Bill. He was apprehensive of the effect of the Ministerial statement on the evening continuation classes.

*Mr. LOUGH suggested that the Amendment might now be dropped and the pledge of the Minister in charge of the Bill accepted. The point put by the hon. Member for Westminster really arose upon the schedule to the Bill. The question dealt with by the hon. Member for Stalybridge could not be dealt with in this clause, and it was provided for in Part III of the Bill.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said the hon. Member for Stalybridge need be under no apprehension that anything in the Bill would take away the privileges given by the Act of 1902, as affecting continuation schools. The Minister for Education had not completely cleared up the more substantial point put to him, but he did not wish to press the matter further.

Question put, and negatived.

*Mr. LOUGH, for Mr. Birrell, moved the following new sub-section:—"(5) Nothing in this section shall prevent the granting or requiring of facilities for special religious instruction in accordance with this Act, or prevent a local education authority, as a condition of an arrangement made under this section with respect to the use of the schoolhouse of an existing voluntary school, from giving an undertaking to give religious instruction, which does not conflict with Section 14 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, in the school." The object of this sub-section was, he said, to fulfil the pledge given at an earlier stage to the hon. Member for the Abercromby Division of Liverpool, and the right hon. Member for Oxford University.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 23, at end, to add the words, '(5) Nothing in this section shall prevent the granting or requiring of facilities for special religious instruction in accordance with this Act, or prevent a local education authority, as a condition of an arrangement made under this section with respect to the use of the schoolhouse of an existing voluntary school, from giving an undertaking to give religious instruction which does not conflict with Section 14, of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, in the school.'"—(Mr. Lough.)

Question proposed "That those words be there added."

Sir WILLIAM ANSON acknowledged that the new sub-section in substance carried out the intention of the Amendment which formerly stood in the name of his right hon. friend the Member for Dublin University; but in order to make it clearer, he moved to amend it so that it should refer not to "special religious instruction under this Act," but to "religious instruction under Sections 3 and 4 of this Act." He begged to move the omission of the word "special."

Amendment to the proposed Amendment proposed—

"In line 2, to leave out the word 'special.'" —(Sir William Anson.)

Question proposed "That the word 'special' stand part of the proposed Amendment."

Dr. MACNAMARA said this sub-section was a valuable concession and had been so received; but he pointed out that the word "special," which would be omitted by the Amendment, was the technical word which described the religious instruction for which facilities were given under Clauses 3 and 4; and that the numbering of the clauses might be altered hereafter and make the Amendment nonsense. It would be better to accept the concession in the words proposed. He thought the words were better as they stood, because Sections 3 and 4 might deal with something else entirely. He suggested to the hon. Member that the best thing he could do was to leave the words as they stood, and accept from the Government the valuable concession made in the words proposed.

Lord R. CECIL said he could not see why the words of the Amendment should be hostile to the intention of the clause. The objection of the hon. Member for North Camberwell was not serious, because the numbers of clauses might be corrected on report. The same class of argument might be used with much more effect against such an expression as "special" which was not yet defined. He had great doubt whether it was the proper word to use. He had felt all along that the expression "special religious instruction" was really one of a very unfortunate character, to say the least of it. Moreover it was not the language used in a later part of the Bill, and that, from the legal point of view, was a matter of some importance. The expression in a later part of the Bill was "religious instruction of a special character." "Special religious instruction" was a very vague phrase, and there was no definition of it in any part of the Bill. The words of the Amendment were very much superior to those proposed by the Government.

Sir WILLIAM ANSON asked leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment to proposed Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Clause 2, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Sir HENRY CRAIK (Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities) said he would not have obtruded himself on the attention of the Committee had it not been for some remarks which were made by the Solicitor-General in his speech. The hon. and learned Gentleman had described the voluntary schools as being in the position of mendicants, losing any rights they might have had for respect for their trusts.

Was that the case with regard to these voluntary schools? At the behest of the State and in accordance with the requirements and conditions of former codes they had carried on the education of the country, and for many years religious education was an indispensable condition of receiving State grants. The Solicitor-General said they had not carried out their part of the stipulation. What was the stipulation which they had failed to carry out? There was, the Solicitor-General said, an understood condition that 50 per cent. of the expenses should be met from voluntary contributions. Did the hon. Member for North Camberwell assent to that description of the bargain between the voluntary schools and the State? The understanding which existed was not that 50 per cent. should be met by voluntary contributions, but that 50 per cent. should be met from "local sources," which included the fees paid by the parents and other sources of income. Of this portion of the local resources which was furnished by school fees, voluntary schools were deprived by the action of the State, while they were brought into competition with schools having far larger resources, and in many respects the standard of educational requirements was raised.

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN called the hon. Gentleman to order as travelling beyond the Motion before the Committee.

*SIR HENRY CRAIK said he wished to follow the ruling of the Deputy-Chairman, and he would have made his remarks very much shorter but for the criticism of the Solicitor-General, who he thought was unfair in regard to voluntary schools. He felt bound to vindicate the rights of the voluntary schools, and to point out the heavy debt which the nation owed to the managers of these voluntary schools. It was incumbent on the State to deal with them and with their obligations under their trusts and to their consciences in a considerate, just, and generous manner. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Education had told them that no one would be more pleased at the action of the Charity Commissioners than the pious donors of the past. But many of these pious donors still survived and continued to take an interest in the schools which they had founded; and he did not know that there was any change in their views. If pious founders felt that sincere gratitude for the complete alteration of their deeds which the right hon. Gentleman ascribed to them, nothing would have been easier than for them to make the terms of their wills so elastic as to permit of easy change. But they all knew that this was very rarely done. The right hon. the President of the Board of Education had made a distinction between public and private trust. It was quite true that such a distinction might be made, but was there not a public morality as well as a private morality in dealing with trusts? Was it likely to have a good impression on the nation if Parliament was found to be treating carelessly, lightly, and without due consideration, the wishes of the trustees? Under the compact entered into in 1870, new schools, even down to the most recent years, had been established. They were now going to sweep away those schools, and the trusts connected with them, and flaunt this before the nation as the idea which Parliament entertained of its moral obligation to those with whom it had entered into a solemn compact. It was because he believed that this clause embodied an unjust and unnecessary interference with existing rights, and with a system of education which was in accordance with the wishes of the parents, and also because the word and the honour of Parliament was pledged to the managers of those schools, and to those who had carried on at a great sacrifice the education of the children of the country, that he looked upon the provisions of this clause as pernicious to education and injurious to the rights both of private individuals, and of corporate communities.

MR. J. RAMSAY MACDONALD (Leicester) said that they on his side of the House had been listening with a great deal of amazement to the extraordinary lugubrious statement of the hon. Gentlemen above the gangway. He was bound to say that he could follow neither their reasoning nor their morals. It was difficult to find in the clause any justification for their allegations of confiscation, robbery, and similar expressions. As a matter of fact, the clause was over-generous to the trustees of voluntary schools, because it provided that public money was to be spent for the improvement of private property. It was an undoubted fact that some of the voluntary schools were bad, some were indifferent, some were good, but some were altogether below the standard of educational efficiency, as had been pointed out in the report of the London County Council. What was going to happen now? The public were to put these schools into good order, and to take them over, and all that they got in return was the use of them during the hours required for elementary education. The point he wished to emphasise was that the Government had been over-generous in the bargain which they proposed to make in regard to the voluntary schools. He felt quite certain it would be a source of great gratification to educationists, both in the House and out of it, if the Government could give some assurance that on the report stage the clause would be supplemented by some sort of provision which would enable secondary education authorities to come compulsorily to an arrangement with the owners of these schools that had been kept in an efficient educational state at the public expense.

*MR. BUTCHER remarked that the local authority was left almost entire discretion on the great issues which came up under this Bill, and that it was given powers great almost beyond precedent and powers which were really also a menace to the religious liberty of large sections of the community. Clause 1 was mandatory, but Clause 2 laid down the principle of local option which was almost the basis of the remainder of the Bill. Yet the principle of compulsion was by no means absent from it. That principle was admitted in a very capricious and harsh way, and in a way which seriously imperilled the whole teaching of religion in the country. The compulsions and the options, the "mays" and the "musts" taken together in their relation one to another, and their various reappearances through the Bill, threw a strange light on the minds of the authors of the Bill. According to the Bill it was plain that, in their eyes, it was a matter of purely local concern whether any religious teaching, even undenominational teaching, should be given in any school. On the other hand, it was a matter of national concern and a thing to be laid down by Parliament that all religious teaching should be prohibited within school hours, and that denominational teaching should be given by others than the members of the school staff. The hon. Member was proceeding to discuss the optional and compulsory provisions of other clauses of the Bill and the peculiarity of the local option given, when,

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN said the hon. Member must confine himself to the discussion of Clause 2 and not discuss other clauses of the Bill.

*MR. BUTCHER said that Clause 2 gave this keynote :—it made optional things which ought to be compulsory, and made compulsory things which ought to be optional. The Minister for Education had said he desired that there should be free bargaining, and no sort of compulsion on the owners of voluntary schools. But it was, surely, virtual compulsion of the cruellest kind under the guise of freedom to say, "Unless you accept these conditions you cease to exist; unless you accept conditions which you came into existence to avoid, you are extinguished as State schools." The right hon. Gentleman had said that what he meant was "business freedom." What they meant was religious freedom. It was there they misunderstood one another; they were talking about things which had no common term. They were not contending, mainly at least, for rent and cleaning, lighting and upkeep of fabrics. They were not so much concerned with the maintenance of the material structure. What they did want to maintain was the spiritual fabric, by which he meant the teaching given in the building, the teachers who gave it, the children who received it. In the last resort it was the welfare of the children for which they were driven to negotiate, and he protested against fighting this out over municipal elections. The bargain was not about coal and gas, but about the things by which men live—things which ought to be above all bargaining and bartering, those spiritual truths which it should be the right of parents to have transmitted to their children.

*LORD MORPETH (Birmingham, S.) said he had voted for the first clause of the Bill because he believed that so far as secular education was concerned it left the settlement of 1902 where it was. Under the settlement of 1902 there was complete control over provided schools. So far as the authority of the Council went with regard to secular education, staffing, building, attendance and teachers, the local authority had absolute control. They had absolute power over the managers, and the foundation managers existed simply and solely for the purpose of safeguarding the religious teaching in the school. Therefore he maintained that under the Bill, so far as secular education was concerned, the settlement of the Act of 1902 was left almost as it was. So far as the secular side of education was concerned it might be said that rather more generous terms had been given by the present Bill than by the Act of 1902. He was putting aside for the moment the consideration of religious education. What was the difference between the arrangements proposed by this Bill and the Bill of 1902? Under the Act of 1902 the local authority was able to call upon the voluntary owners to enlarge their schools, or to carry out necessary repairs, and to make such alterations as they, the local authority, desired. Moreover, they had the use of the school for all school purposes gratuitously; they were under no obligation to pay rent; they had the free and absolute use of the schools for all purposes of daily school teaching without payment of any rent or charge for upkeep or repairs, which was put upon the local managers. Under this Bill the local education authorities would have to pay rent for the schools, although it was true that more than the rent would be found, in all probability, by means of grants from the central government. In addition to that they would have to pay for such alterations as they demanded as being necessary and for the repairs. Therefore, looking at them from the financial point of view the terms offered by the right hon. Gentleman were not ungenerous, he might even say they were handsome. The local authority was in the future to pay rent for the school during the school hours, and the buildings for parochial and other purposes were to be in the hands of the trustees and managers. From the financial point of view the terms were perhaps too generous. They were so generous that he could not help thinking that the right hon. Gentleman hoped by this generosity in money to ease the difficulty and to conceal the injustice he was doing in other directions. The trustees, the men who built these schools, built them not in order to make rent; they were not companies. If they had been companies and this a winding up of the company it would be a satisfactory end for the shareholders. But the Party opposite knew very well that these men were not only unable to look at this question from that point of view, but that that, indeed, was the last consideration that affected their minds, and it was for that reason they opposed this clause. It was because when they came to Clauses 3 and 4 they found that the reasons for which these schools were built and maintained for more than a generation were violated, they were compelled to oppose this Bill, although they recognised that so far as the secular instruction was concerned, the conditions were generous. One consideration must not be lost sight of, and that was that these schools were built and maintained to safeguard religious education. It was often asserted not with justice or complete truth that these schools were built to keep out the school board rates. That might have been a contributory reason in some cases, but it did not cover the whole field. The men who parted with these schools might have parted with them not with a light heart, but with some satisfaction if they felt that by that sacrifice they could secure teaching in accordance with the desires of the founders, not only in these schools, but in every school in the country. The whole basis of the Bill for the granting of religious education only in the transferred schools was wholly illogical. Why should the parent who desired definite religious teaching for his child be debarred from that definite religious teaching because he lived in a parish where there was only a local education authority's school, while a parent who lived in the next parish where there was a transferred school could demand definite religious teaching. Many Members on the Opposition side of the House would have willingly acquiesced in the transfer of these schools, and would have even readily supported the Bill if in making that sacrifice and transferring those schools they could have obtained these rights for the parents not only in the voluntary school districts, but throughout the whole of the schools of the country. But that settlement had been denied them by the Government. For his own part, desiring as he did that there should be a settlement of this question, that some final solution of it should be arrived at, that the constant quarrelling, more bitter in this House than in the country, but which raged throughout the parishes of the country, which was used for political purposes, should cease and that the whole controversy should be put an end to, he ventured to say that the only way in which it could be ended was by so legislating that no injustice should remain on the shoulders of any religious body or on any Party. His great regret was that the authors of this Bill, which did in a way provide a natural solution, had not had the courage to go still further and produce a final settlement. He was sure that there were many who desired to see the cause of education advanced. Men working in the country on local Boards of Education would have been ready to support the right hon. Gentleman if he had elected to take that course. The right hon. Gentleman no doubt despised the support of any one outside his big battalions, but he was mistaken in so doing, because it was only by means of that kind, it was only by satisfying all religious bodies, by satisfying not only one Church, but all the Churches, that he could hope to carry a Bill which would result in a permanent settlement. It was because Clause 2 did not carry out a broad and permanent policy, as it might have done if the right hon. Gentleman had only faced this question with a little more courage, that he was compelled to vote against it although he voted for Clause 1.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover) said every Member of the Committee would admit that the speech to which they had just listened was closely reasoned and able, but gave ground for the sad reflection that such a speech could be delivered and produce no effective result on those who sat opposite. The present misconception which underlay the debate was based on the fact that hon. Members opposite seemed to think that voluntary schools existed on air; that they could live without means, and that they were now paying for a special indulgence which this House ought not to recognise at all. Two remarkable speeches had been delivered this evening—that by the hon. Member for Leicester, and that by the hon. Member for the Cambridge University. The first speaker, whose sincerity was apparent, held that in this Bill the Government, in Clause 1, exhibited undue generosity to all the voluntary schools. The hon. Member for Leicester was followed by the hon. Member for the Cambridge University, who pleaded that money did not enter into his mind in his consideration of the question. The hon. Member struck a spiritual note which found an echo in many of the hearts of those who listened to him. Hon. Members who listened to those two speeches must have felt that a chasm divided them. They had to bridge that chasm. The hon. Member for Leicester had argued that the Government had been too generous, because public money was to be spent on the improvement of private property. That was what nine out of ten of those who opposed the Opposition in this matter believed. They had got it into their heads that the public was giving its money for the purpose of benefiting private property. He would crave the indulgence of the Committee whilst he looked a little more closely into that phrase "private property." In what sense were the voluntary schools private property? What emolument was drawn from them? That was very important. When it was said that they were spending money on private property the suggestion was certainly conveyed that private individuals were profiting at the expense of taxpayers. Then it did not mean private property in that sense. How could it? These denominational schools placed themselves under public control rent free. The Act of 1902 handed them over to the county or town councils free of rent; all that was reserved was the control of the religious education and the appointment of one teacher, subject to the veto on educational grounds of the local authority. Thus private property was acquired for a public purpose for nothing. He would not charge the hon. Member for North Camberwell and those who agreed with him with deliberately wishing that the children in denominational schools should have a worse education and less sanitary surroundings than the children in board schools. Would it be fair to charge them with wishing to squeeze out the denominational schools? They wanted to come to an understanding as to the point of view from which they should look at this matter. These schools were not private property in the sense that any individual derived profit from them, or in the sense that they did not subserve a public object. They subserved that object at a less cost than by any other means. Then it was said that public money was used for the improvement of these schools. Why were they improved? In order that the public object might be carried out at less cost than would otherwise be the case. If, as had been done in the first clause, they wiped these schools clean off, they were told it must not be called "confiscation." He would call it "commandeering." When they commandeered a man's horse for the public object of waging war they fed the horse, and when the war was over they gave the owner some small fee for its use; they did not contend that they had conferred an immense favour upon the owner by taking his horse to use it for a purpose which he never contemplated. That really again illustrated the impossibility of bridging the chasm between those who held the views so eloquently expressed by the hon. Member for Cambridge University and the hon. Member for Leicester, representing those who wished for religious instruction and those who desired merely secular. Clause 2 was to bridge the chasm dividing those who in their heart of hearts were in favour of secular education and those who in their hearts, souls, and consciences, believed that the children should have the kind of religious instruction which their parents desired, but a more futile bridge could not be designed for the purpose. The Government built their bridge by interfering with trusts and abolishing Church of England denominational teaching. Was the object adequate? He would look at the matter from the point of view of those who said that perhaps special arrangements ought to be made for the Roman Catholics, but that if the Church of England were not satisfied with Cowper-Temple instruction they ought to be. That was a view very widely held on the other side of the House. From that point of view was there any adequate reason for interfering in this drastic fashion with trusts? They would get rid of the catechism for one half-hour a week in Church of England schools. Was it really worth while undertaking this drastic and wholesale interference with trusts, and to spend £1,000,000, and perhaps £3,000,000 a year in order to put an affront upon the Church and the religious convictions of millions of people to get rid of this half-hour? They had tried to carry the clause first by concession. Well, the concessions in substance were always carried over to a future date, and he did not attach much importance to concessions until he had heard them read from the Table. But the concessions amounted to very little indeed. Let them take the concession made to-night. What was asked for was that schools which had been dedicated to religious purposes should be free to have religious instruction given on any day in the week. What they had got was the liberty to bargain between the two Parties. The hon. Member for Leicester had attacked not only their reasons but their morals. It might seem wrong that any Member of this House should speak when their proceedings must come to an end at half past ten o'clock; but they represented people in the country, and it was their duty to protest against that which they thought unjust and inexpedient, and would only lead to years of barren controversy. This clause was the proper occasion on which to protest against the whole framework and structure of the Bill. The Government seemed to regard denominational education as a foible to be at best tolerated, but to be made expensive—a thing which the rich man might pay for, but which was denied to the poor. Whatever might be the money balance shown in this or any other Bill, the parent who desired denominational instruction had as much right to have what he desired as had the parent who desired undenominational instruction. Their opponents ignored the essential fact that Roman Catholics, Anglicans, and Jews all paid rates and taxes towards the education of which they did not approve. Until it was allowed that these different classes ought to stand upon an equality and that they all paid alike, they would never agree.

DR. MACNAMARA said he had to offer a few words in reply to the challenge of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. The right hon. Gentleman claimed that the Act of 1902 had handed over every denominational schools to full public control.

MR. WYNDHAM: Subject to the two reservations which I mentioned.

DR. MACNAMARA said the Act of 1902 undoubtedly put the denominational schools upon the rates and taxes. He made no complaint of that. But it violated the common agreement of 1870. Up to that time the denominational schools had been maintained by grants and voluntary contributions, and in that year it was laid down that by way of supplementing that system there should be a new class of school receiving rates and taxes. Everybody agreed. The late Mr. W. H. Smith was one of those who agreed that the moment they touched the public rates the school must be under full public control and if they gave any religious instruction at all it must not have any formulary distinctive of any particular religious denomination. That was why they were now bringing in a Bill to amend the Act of 1902. The right hon. Gentleman said the Act of 1902 put these schools under full public control free of rent. It gave six managers to each, the public having the appointment of two. Those managers appointed the teacher, and the authority that appointed the teacher controlled the school. Then the Act of 1902 gave the local authority the right to use the schools free of rental on five days a week and three nights a week, but the denominational managers had the right to use them two days and four nights a week for any purpose, and the public had to make good the wear and tear. This was full popular control and the free use of the schools! As for the sanctity of trust deeds, all the speeches on that subject were curiously belated. They ought to have been made four years ago. The model trust deed of the Church of England schools laid it down that the principal officiating minister of the parish for the time being should have the supervision of the religious and moral teaching, but the Leader of the Opposition gave this over to a Committee of six. Could there be a greater violation of the trust deeds? The model trust deed placed the appointment and the dismissal of teachers in the hands of a committee, including a minister and his licensed curate. The Act of 1902 took it out of their hands. The model trust deed said there might be associated with the management of the school other persons who must subscribe 20s. a year, and be communicants of the Church of England. He wondered how many of the present managers subscribed 20s. a year. He would be very much surprised if they could find one. If they did not subscribe 20s., at any rate they must be communicants of the Church of England; the whole thing was perfectly grotesque. It was too late in the day to talk about the sanctity of trust deeds. The present Leader of the Opposition abrogated the trust deeds entirely by the Kenyon-Slaney Clause, and he hoped they would hear no more in this discussion about the sanctity of trust deeds.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said that the hon. Member's speech made him feel four years younger—a happy and unusual effect of oratory. He really imagined, as he listened to the impassioned eloquence of the hon. Gentleman, that the House was still in the middle of the long-drawn debates of 1902, when unfortunately the Government of the day were innocent of the developments to which the closure had since been carried. He asserted that under the Act of 1902 popular control was conceded, except in those particulars that were necessary to preserve the denominational religious character of schools established by voluntary action. It was true that the majority of the managers in the case of a voluntary school had to belong to the denomination of the school, but these managers had no control over the curriculum of the school, except with regard to religious education. Everything connected with secular education was handed over by the Act of 1902 to the local education authority. The only conceivable exception was that the initiative in the appointment of teachers lay in the managers. But the local authority had an absolute veto on any teacher who was not competent in their opinion to deal with secular education. How then could it be contended that popular control was not recognised by the Act of 1902? The Chancellor of the Exchequer in a speech at Northampton the other day had declared that the Act of 1902 destroyed popular control. That was a profound error. In every particular in which the Act of 1902 modified the Act of 1870 the modification was in the direction of popular control. [AN HON. MEMBER: What about the abolition of the school boards?] He had yet to learn that the handing over of education to the county councils in any sense militated against the true doctrine of popular control It was a gross mis-statement to assert that the Act of 1902 diminished popular control. It increased it enormously. What was the second point of the hon. Gentleman? It was that the Opposition were debarred from even mentioning the words trust deed, because the trust deeds were modified under the Act of 1902. Nobody denied it. But because of that were they not to be allowed to deal with the subject now? It was true that in view of the modified circumstances with which they had to deal trust deeds made in different circumstances had to be changed. Some of the supporters of the Government of that day viewed these provisions with regard to trust deeds with great distress and some dismay. He held now the view he then entertained that the best way in which to maintain the spirit of trust deeds was to adapt them to the changed circumstances of the time, with a view to the maintenance of the voluntary school. But there was a great difference between making modifications in order to carry out the original purposes of the trust compared with a change which was made in order to squeeze into the rigid formula of this Bill institutions which it was the main object of the Bill to destroy. They destroyed not only the external form of the trust, but its spirit as well. The Party to which he belonged had been charged all over the country with being too favourable to the voluntary schools. It was said also that they had done an injury to those who established the voluntary schools, because they modified the trust deeds so as to put them under the policy by which the voluntary schools were preserved. But anybody who could look behind the mere letter to the spirit would see that the manner in which the late Government dealt with trustees was profoundly different from that which had guided the policy of the present Government. So much for a subject which was in some respects belated. He certainly never contemplated when he came down to listen to this part of the debate that he should have to deal with these ancient controversies. Now he desired to say a few words by way of assisting rather than embarrassing the Government. There were two gaps in the Bill as compared with the plan announced by the Government. The first was that all the right hon. Gentleman's pledges to give facilities compulsorily must break down if the local authority was allowed to decide as to whether they should take over a school or not. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that gap, and he was going to try to remedy it. The second was that if they compelled a local authority to take over a school there was nothing in the Bill at present to compel it to take that school over on conditions that would ensure denominational facilities in the schools as promised. The right hon. Gentleman had promised an Amendment which would compel a local authority when it had taken over a school to give in that school, as promised, denominational facilities. Of course, he was not in a position to argue on an Amendment which was not before them, but he was bound to say something about the clause in which that Amendment was ultimately to appear. He thought it was due to the right hon. Gentleman to tell him quite fairly at this stage of the proceedings that in his judgment the right hon. Gentleman would be breaking a Parliamentary engagement if he brought forward the proposed Amendment to Clause 2 in the form he had adumbrated. Than the right hon. Gentleman there was not a more honourable Member in the House, but he had through inadvertence or forgetfulness allowed himself to slip into a Parliamentary position from which he would find it very difficult to extricate himself, his Government, or his Party with full credit if he intended to insist on bringing forward his Amendment to the clause named in the shape in which he had promised. In the speech of the right hon. Gentleman in introducing the Bill, as well as in those of other leading members of the Government, there would be found stated beyond possibility of doubt two propositions. The first was that facilities were to be compulsory; the second that there was to be no interference with private owners of voluntary schools. He wished to know how the Government could possibly now come down and make it a condition of granting the first of their promises that they should break the second. Yet the Minister for Education, with those pledges fresh in mind, had on more than one occasion argued that he was perfectly willing to carry out the first of these pledges provided gentlemen on the Opposition side would absolve him from carrying out the second. He thought it only fair, before the Amendment was placed on the Paper and before the Government were finally pledged to any course, to give them fair warning. He asserted that the announced policy of the Government was a clear breach of Parliamentary pledges—of the expectations held out by responsible Ministers. He begged the right hon. Gentleman to look back on his speeches and those of his colleagues, and see whether he had in any way perverted or exaggerated the statements that had been made. If the right hon. Gentleman found that he had not exaggerated those statements, he hoped that for the sake of his own credit and that of his Party he would not ask the House to accept from him the fulfilment of one thing he had promised at the price of something else which he had also promised. If he did not listen to these words of warning—he did not wish to use language too solemn for the occasion—if he refused to accept the suggestion he made in all sincerity, he would do himself the utmost injury. The right hon. Gentleman was a man in whom they were all disposed to place the utmost reliance, they knew how high was his sense of honour, how clear his head, how careful were his statements. If he deserved those eulogies, as he did, could he really come down to the House and throw over all that he and his colleagues had said and, presenting a pistol at the head of the Committee, demand their acceptance of an arrangement which was wholly inconsistent with everything that had been said before? He would not press the matter further now, but he rejoiced that the opportunities of the debate had enabled him seriously to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to a matter which deserved his most careful attention.

MR. BIRRELL said he did not rise to prolong the discussion which in some respects he regretted. Being himself not a closure man at all, he was very anxious that they should have full time for the consideration of the important clauses that lay immediately ahead of them; and he could not help thinking that if right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite had seen their way to finish this clause at nine o'clock, they might have spent two more hours on Clause 3, and thereby obviated some of the hardship of which the Opposition so loudly complained the other night; he did not know that they would have lost anything. [OPPOSITION cries of "Oh, oh."] He was sure the Leader of the Opposition was the last man to quarrel with the suggestion that even the time occupied by one of his speeches might not possibly have been better spent. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that he was obliged to him for his solemn and reiterated warning, and he appreciated the spirit in which it was given. The right hon. Gentleman evidently thought that he had, perhaps inadvertently and from inexperience, placed himself in a somewhat awkward position, that his honour was somewhat involved, and that unless he walked very warily he should find himself in an awkward Parliamentary predicament. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that he meant to be faithful to all his pledges and promises as they had been made, and that if he found himself in a position which prevented him from carrying them out he should immediately place himself in a position of perfect freedom and less responsibility. He thanked the right hon. Gentleman for his warning. He made no claim to much Parliamentary experience, he found himself in a position of great pressure and very considerable difficulty, and he was obliged to anybody who gave him assistance, and he was bound to say their name was legion. It was an honour which he welcomed to find the late Prime Minister amongst their number. He had already recognised that there was a gap in Clause 2. No Bill that a Government proposed or suggested ever took shape in which that gap did not exist. They proceeded on the assumption that the local authority should have control in this matter, that it should lie with them to broach the question as to what schools they should take over. They assumed, and he thought their clauses were so framed as to make that assumption natural, that in the great number of cases the owners and trustees of voluntary schools would make the arrangement contemplated under Clause 2. If they did, the Government said and meant that the facilities contemplated by Clause 3 should be compulsory. The second gap to which the right hon. Gentleman had alluded seemed to him to be a somewhat small one. No doubt the Government did assume that they could safely leave it to the owners and trustees of voluntary schools to secure that these facilities should be made part of every bargain that was entered into. When the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster spoke of the facilities being compulsory he no doubt felt that he was safe in assuming that the owners and trustees would make them an absolute part of the bargain, and that in every case where the local authority had expressed its desire to take a school compulsory they would be. He himself had studiously avoided using the word except in the sense that he recognised in the Bill as introduced—in every draft that he had seen—that the gap existed. It was quite impossible for him to have used language, except by sheer clumsiness, tending to conceal from the House the fact that it lay with the local authority in the first instance to open negotiations and decide whether or not it would take over the schools. That gap was in all the drafts and in all their minds. He recognised when it was made the subject of argument that it was perhaps a fair matter for Parliamentary comment that the gap existed. Accordingly he felt still desirous of bridging that gap, if it could be done without interfering with the authority and responsibility of the local authority for the efficient and economical management of education within its area. As to Clause 3 he could only repeat that he genuinely regretted that so important a clause should have been curtailed unnecessarily of two hours of Parliamentary time. All the Committee had got for those two hours was the warning addressed to himself, for which in all sincerity he expressed his obligation to the right hon. Gentleman.

*COLONEL WILLIAMS (Dorsetshire, W.) said the hon. Member opposite had been challenged by the Leader of the Opposition in regard to certain points, and he wanted the Committee to take note of the fact that the challenge of the Leader of the Opposition had not been responded to. For himself he happened to have been in the position of a school manager before 1902 and after 1902, and he knew that now the board of managers could not order a steel pen or a bottle of ink without the consent of the county council. The school managers could not appoint a teacher or a head teacher without the leave of the county council. They had tried it and failed. All the power the managers had was to say that the teacher was able to give the religious instruction they needed. They could select the teacher. They could send his name to the county council with their approval, but if the county council said that the teacher was not fit to give secular teaching, their recommendation went for nothing. This being the state of things, if it did not give absolute control to the county council he did not know what did. The last election was won upon a good many fallacies, and one of the biggest fallacies was that the county councils had not control of the schools. There was full popular control, as he had stated over and over again at his meetings, and as he now stated to the Committee. When they consented to the alteration of their trust deeds in 1902, it was for the purposes of obtaining an advantage for their schools. [Ironical MINISTERIAL cheers.] He was glad that hon. Members agreed with him, but he would point out that now they were being asked to alter their trust deeds for nothing or even less than nothing. The Government were taking away the purposes for which the trusts were established. The ratepayers as much controlled the education rate as they did the money raised for the roads, and no one contended that the roads were not popularly controlled.

And, it being half-past Ten of the clock, the Chairman proceeded, pursuant to the Order of the House of June 18th, to put forthwith the Question, "That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 424; Noes, 109. (Division List No. 138.)

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir Alexander Acland-Hood and Viscount Valentia.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report progress, and ask leave to sit again"—(Mr. Lough).—put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY (IRELAND) BILL.

Order for consideration read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill, as amended, be now considered."

MR. MACVEAGH (Down, S.) thought it would be the general opinion of the House that this was a most inconvenient hour to start a discussion on a private Bill. He believed that never in the history of Parliament had it been proposed to commence private Bill business at this hour of the night. A great many hon. Members were at the House at three this morning, and it would be unreasonable to ask them to consider two highly contentious private Bills. So far as this Bill was concerned, if they started upon its discussion they were likely to be here until three o'clock the next day. He therefore moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. KEIR HARDIE seconded the Motion. It was eminently desirable that the House should come to the consideration of the Bills fresher than most hon. Members were at the present moment, after practically an all-night sitting.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the debate be adjourned."—(Mr. MacVeagh.)

SIR FREDERICK BANBURY (City of London) said no sufficient reason had been given for the postponement of the Bill, which he understood involved an expenditure of a million of money. If the Bill were rejected that money would not be spent, which might or might not be an advantage, but he had not heard any reason for it.

MR. DALZIEL (Kircaldy Burghs) hoped the Government would accept the Motion for the adjournment. The Question for them to consider was not whether a million of money was going to be spent or not as a result of the passing of this Bill, but whether the House ought to discuss it at the present time or consider it on some other more convenient occasion. If the hon. Baronet had been a Member of the House when this measure was considered before, he would have known that there were several matters of considerable importance, and they were adjourned on the understanding that they would have an opportunity when the Bill came back to the House of considering them, and of hearing what explanations would be given by the representatives of the railway company in the House. The hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London had asked them to consider this Bill to-night, and he welcomed him in his new position of asking them to pass legislation. One of the qualifications of the hon. Baronet was said to be that he could speak at any time, and at any length, upon any subject without any preparation. He hoped the Government would lend the weight of their authority in the direction of postponing this Bill. As one who was opposed to the suspension of a rule which the House had solemnly adopted, under which they adjourned at eleven o'clock, he objected to entering upon the consideration of private Bills at this late hour of the night. He hoped the supporters of the Bill would recognise, in the interests of the Bill itself, that it was the obvious desire of the House that the discussion should be adjourned.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR invited an expression of opinion from the Government on this encroachment upon the rule which made 11 o'clock the natural limit of their proceedings. Rightly or wrongly, the House had laid down that 11 o'clock was the natural limit of their proceedings, and he saw a certain objection to relegating private business to be considered after that hour. He thought they ought to have a clear statement from the Government as to what line they intended to take in connection with the general Private Bill legislation which still remained to be disposed of.

MR. ASQUITH said that by a Resolution passed yesterday the House had deliberately determined that the Private Bills should be taken, and it would be a bad precedent for a new House, in deference to a feeling of exaggerated uxoriousness, to suspend proceedings before 11 o'clock after passing such a Resolution. Of the merits of the Bill he knew nothing, and probably the discussion would be brief.

MR. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton) protested against contentious Private Bills being taken after 11 o'clock. He regretted that he could not on this occasion join in the appeal which had been made by the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London that this Bill should be proceeded with now.

*Mr. EMMOTT said that perhaps, as Chairman of Ways and Means, he was responsible for putting these Bills down on the Paper and he ought to say a word upon this question. He did not speak either as a supporter or an opponent of the Bill; therefore, anything he said had no reference to the point of merits. Two reasons for adjournment had been urged. First of all, there had been a general claim made that private business must not be taken after eleven o'clock, and in the second place it had been stated in regard to this particular night that the fact that the House was kept late last night was a reason for adjourning the private business put down. These were two separate and distinct questions. He thought it would be presumptuous for him to attempt to advise the House as to what it should do in regard to the adjournment to-night, but, as Chairman of Ways and Means, he would ask the House not to come to the general conclusion that they would not take Private Bill business after eleven o'clock. The House agreed to a Motion last night which stated that private business was to be taken after eleven o'clock on nights when the Education Bill was under discussion, though opposed, and in these circumstances it would be wrong, if he might be permitted to say so, to enter into an engagement against the taking of private business after eleven o'clock. Let him point out what might take place. Any Member could block any Bill because he disliked one clause, and he thought the result would be to introduce dire confusion into Private Bill legislation. He expressed no opinion on the question whether it would not be a good thing to adjourn the business put down for to-night, but he did beg the House not to come to any general conclusion against discussing these Bills after eleven.

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said he desired to make an appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to what he thought would be the result of taking the Great Northern Railway (Ireland) Bill at this hour. It was a contested Bill. His hon. friends opposite meant to fight it, and he meant to help them. Hon. Members got home about three o'clock this morning, and some came back early to attend committees upstairs. He hoped the Bill would not be proceeded with now, and he appealed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer not to prolong this controversy.

Mr. ASQUITH asked which Bill was now being considered.

*Mr. SPEAKER: The English Bill.

Mr. ASQUITH said he understood that only the Irish Bill was opposed.

Mr. MACVEAGH said he objected to the principle of taking contested private business after 11 o'clock.

Mr. MORTON said that, if the Bill were not opposed, it would not be on the Paper to-night.

Mr. ASQUITH said they were sitting on a somewhat exceptional night, and he thought they might assent to the Motion for adjournment, but entirely without prejudice to the general question of private business being taken after 11 o'clock.

Question put, and agreed to.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Provision for Widow and Children of late Petty Officer George Howe.

MR. COURTHOPE (Sussex, Rye): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he is aware that first class Petty Officer George Howe died recently in Hastings Hospital after undergoing a number of surgical operations, that George Howe had served in the Royal Navy for twenty years, and was, at the time of his death, serving as a coastguard at Bexhill, that his widow and four young children are unprovided for, and are dependent upon private charity; and whether the Admiralty propose to make any provision for the widow and children.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) This second class petty officer (commissioned boatman) had only seventeen years seven days service counting towards pension. He died on active service, and there is therefore nothing due on account of pension, and the widow and children are not eligible for assistance from naval funds. He was, however, entitled to £2 good-conduct gratuity, and steps will be taken to pay this to the widow. No provision in the shape of pension or gratuity can be made from the funds at Greenwich Hospital for the widow, as Howe's death was not attributable to accident or extraordinary exposure or exertion on duty. The children are eligible for consideration for admission to homes at the expense of Greenwich Hospital, and application may be made on their behalf to the Admiralty, stating their names and ages.

Publication of Inspector's Report on the Case of M'Glone.

MR. GINNELL (Westmeath, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will make available to hon. Members a copy of the inspector's report in the recent case of M'Glone, with the name of the inspector, his qualifications, experience, at whose instance he was first employed, and any explanation he has to offer of his conduct in fixing the value that he did on M'Glone's holding.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The reports of the inspectors are confidential, being made for the information of the Estates Commissioners only, and it would be contrary to practice and to public policy to lay them upon the Table of the House. The Commissioners do not think it desirable to state the name of the inspector in the present case. They themselves are answerable for any action which they may take upon their inspectors' reports.

Publication of Information by the Irish Board of Intermediate Education.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the information which he has declined to give to the House of Commons in reference to the recent proceedings of the Board of intermediate Education in Ireland has been communicated to a Dublin newspaper, together with an announcement that the Board has decided by a large majority to disregard the recent unanimous decision of the House of Commons in reference to its rules; and whether he will not, in view of these facts, make a full statement of all the facts in relation to the action of the Board in this matter.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) Until I saw the hon. Member's Question I did not know that any statement of the nature indicated had appeared in a Dublin newspaper, nor do I know what the statement was. The fact, however, is that the Board have, since I last answered a Question on this subject, informed the Irish Government that they find it impossible to prepare a new set of rules in time to enable them to be approved by the Lord-Lieutenant and lie forty days on the Table of both Houses before August; and that, as the gravest inconvenience would be caused to the numerous schools which prepare pupils for the Board's examinations if the programme of those examinations were not announced by the month of August, they find that the only course open to them is to continue the existing programme, viz., that in force for 1906. They accordingly propose to submit to the Lord-Lieutenant for his approval the rules for 1906. This is a purely temporary expedient, rendered necessary, in the opinion of the Board, by the shortness of the time available.

Irish Evicted Tenants—Claim of Mary Anne Mortland.

MR. McVEIGH (Donegal, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the attention of the Estates Commissioners has been called to the claim of Mary Anne Mortland, to the farm of her father, Joseph Mortland who was evicted from his holding on the Wilson Estate, Carnone, Raphoe, East Donegal, in 1894, and has since died in Australia; and, if not, whether he will direct them to send down an inspector to inquire into her case, seeing that Moses Wallace is in the full enjoyment of her farm; and whether he will say if Miss Mortland, now come of age, will be in some way restored to her farm, or be paid the value of it.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have received from Miss Mortland an application for reinstatement in the holding from which her late father was evicted. This holding has been bought under the Land Purchase Acts by Moses Wallace, the present occupier, with whom the Commissioners have no power to interfere. The Commissioners, however, will consider Miss Mortland's application in the event of their acquiring untenanted land in the neighbourhood.

Case of John Riordan.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the attention of the Estates Commissioners has been repeatedly called to the case of John Riordan, Gneeves, Glantane, Mallow, an evicted tenant on the Grant Estate; and in view of the fact that the estate has been purchased some time since, the case has been considered; and, if so, with what result.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners have referred the case of John Riordan to one of their inspectors for inquiry, and are awaiting the receipt of his report in the matter.

Report of the Irish Consultative Committee of Education.

MR. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will lay upon the Table of the House, as a Command Paper, a copy of the Report drawn up by the Consultative Committee of Education consequent upon the communications that passed between the late Irish Government and the representatives of the Committee in November, 1905.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I have received a copy of the Report in question, which is marked private and confidential, but I cannot find that the Report has ever been formally presented. It deals with matters which are now under the consideration of the Irish Government, and I cannot, as at present advised, undertake to present it to Parliament.

Sale of the Roberts Estate, County Longford.

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Longford, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any negotiations are pending for the sale of the Roberts Estate, in the parish of Newtown Cashel, county Longford; whether he is aware that, amongst seven others, Patrick Casserly, of Culnagore Wood, was evicted in 1889, his farm since remaining derelict; whether he is aware that in the course of negotiations for the sale of this property the solicitor in charge has stated that Casserly's holding, along with some fifty acres of plantation, has been let to a planter tenant for the purposes of sale under the Land Purchase Act of 1903; whether such a tenancy can be so created; and whether, in the interest of the general peace of the district, he will suggest to the Estates Commissioners not to consider this application until they first exhaust the provisions of

The Land Purchase Act, 1903, for the restoration of evicted tenants to their holdings.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that they are not aware whether negotiations are pending for the sale of the estate referred to. No proceedings in the case have yet come before them, and they have no information as to the estate itself or as to the statements alleged to have been made in the course of the negotiations. The evicted tenant, Patrick Casserly, referred to in the Question, has been provided with another holding in the county of Dublin, and is in occupation of it.

Refusal of Gun Licence to Mr. Daniel Casey.

MR. POWER (Waterford, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether a licence to carry a gun has been refused by Mr. Orr, R.M., to Mr. Daniel Casey, of Grawn Kilmacthomas; what are the grounds of such refusal; whether he is aware that Mr. Orr, R.M., considers it his duty in all cases when applied to for a gun licence to ascertain whether there is a possibility of the applicant, in the view of local landlords and land agents, using the gun to shoot game, even though the applicant would become entitled to obtain a game licence on first obtaining the magistrate's licence; and whether he will inform Mr. Orr that he has no justification for refusing such an application on any grounds other than such as relate to the peace of the district, and that the preservation of game for the benefit of a limited class is not part of his duty.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed that the fact is as stated in the first part of the Question. The power of issuing licences under the Peace Preservation Act is vested in the resident magistrate, and it would be contrary to practice to state in this House the grounds of refusal in a particular case. I think it right, however, to state that Mr. Orr informs me that the question of the preservation of game does not in any way influence his decision in such cases, and that he makes no inquiry from this point of view. All resident magistrates are made aware of the fact that the Act was passed for the preservation of life and property and not for the protection of game.

Royal Irish Constabulary Sergeants in Belfast with over Thirty Years Service.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland how many sergeants of the Royal Irish Constabulary in Belfast are at present serving with over thirty years service.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Inspector-General informs me that there are at present serving in Belfast fifteen sergeants of the Royal Irish Constabulary who have had over thirty years service.

Sergeant Long, Royal Irish Constabulary.

MR. McKILLOP (Armagh, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state whether Sergeant Long, Royal Irish Constabulary, recently appointed to Loughgall, county Armagh, was appointed to this district on his own application, or whether he was transferred by order of the Inspector-General; and whether this sergeant, while stationed at Poyntzpass, was repeatedly reported for the manner in which he discharged his duties.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Inspector-General informs me that he transferred Sergeant Long to Loughgall upon the recommendation of the county inspector and not upon the sergeant's own application. The only complaint made against the sergeant while he was stationed at Poyntzpass was one contained in an anonymous letter, which was found on inquiry to be without foundation.

Religious Persuasion of Royal Irish Constabulary Sergeant Stationed at Poyntzpass.

MR. McKILLOP: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that the present sergeant of the Royal Irish Constabulary stationed at Poyntzpass, county Armagh, is of a different religion from the majority of the inhabitants; will he say whether this also applied to his predecessors; whether a sergeant professing the same religion as the majority of the inhabitants has ever been appointed to this town; and whether, seeing that there is no magistrate sitting at Poyntzpass Petty Sessions of the same religion as the majority of the inhabitants, he will consider the advisability of at least appointing a sergeant whose religious views are in sympathy with those of the inhabitants.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Inspector-General informs me that the sergeant of Royal Irish Constabulary at Poyntzpass is a Protestant, as were his predecessors for a number of years past. The inhabitants of the village itself are about equally divided as between Catholics and Protestants, but the latter are largely in the majority in the district of which the village forms part. The Inspector-General does not propose to remove the present sergeant, who impartially discharges his duties.

Pressure for Payment of Rents on the Faulkner Estate.

MR. HAMMOND (Carlow): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware, with reference to the Faulkner Estate, Springhill, Queen's County, that many poor tenants on this property, notwithstanding that under the agreement in this matter they were to be relieved of the payment of one year's rent, are now being pressed for payment of this year's rent; and will he endeavour to induce the Estates Commissioners to effect an early definitive settlement in this case.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners have no knowledge whether pressure for the payment of rent is taking place in the case of this estate. The Commissioners expect that they will be able, by the end of this month, to make an offer for the purchase of the estate.

Residence in Precincts of Workhouse of Family of the Master.

MR. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Local Government Board has any rule in force with regard to residence in the precincts of a workhouse of the family of which the father is master of the workhouse and the mother is the matron of the same institution.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Answer is in the negative. It is not the practice of the Local Government Board to prevent the children of a master and matron from residing with their parents in the workhouse, assuming that the children are not of an age to provide for themselves. Each case is decided by the Board upon its merits.

Religious Instruction of Catholic Children in Armagh Workhouse.

MR. MACVEAGH: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state what steps have been taken, or will be taken, by the Local Government Board to secure that the Catholic children in the Armagh Workhouse will receive adequate religious instruction; and whether, seeing that this matter has been under consideration for four years, he can say when the Local Government Board intends to deal with it.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed that in the year 1903 the guardians of the Armagh Union, despite the protest of the Local Government Board, dispensed with the services of the assistant teacher, who had also acted as Catholic catechist. The Board have since repeatedly urged the guardians to appoint a successor, and have expressed their willingness to allow recoupment from the local taxation fund upon the salary involved. The guardians, however, have declined to make any appointment, and, under the existing regulations, the Board have no power to compel them to do so.

Religious Denominations of County Armagh Police Force.

MR. MACVEAGH: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the numbers of the different religious denominations in the police force in county Antrim; how many have been promoted from the seniority list since the appointment of County Inspector Reeves, and to what religious denominations they belong; and how many have been promoted by competitive examination from the P list during the same period, and to what religious denominations they belong.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed by the Inspector-General that there are at present 126 Protestants and 112 Roman Catholics in the county Antrim force. Since the appointment of County Inspector Reeves to take charge of the county there have been twenty promotions from the seniority list, and of this number fourteen were Protestants and six Catholics. In the same period seven men were promoted from the P list by competitive examination, of whom two were Protestants and five Catholics.

Portuguese Kaffirs in the Witwatersrand Mines.

MR. NIELD (Middlesex, Ealing): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies what is the total number of African natives employed in the Witwatersrand mines, and what proportion are Portuguese subjects; whether the work performed by such last-mentioned natives is similar in character to that discharged by Chinese coolies; whether the importation of these Portuguese Kaffirs is subject to any and what regulations; whether there is any substantial difference either in the methods and regulations relating to the housing and control, in and out of working hours, between these Kaffirs and the Chinese coolies who are working under the terms of the Chinese Labour Ordinance; and, if not, what steps the Government have taken, or propose to take, in the matter.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) On 31st March 84,409 African natives were employed on the Witwatersrand gold mines, of whom about 60 per cent. were Portuguese subjects. The work performed by them is similar to that performed by Chinese coolies. These Portuguese Kaffirs are engaged on yearly contracts. As regards housing and control, the position of both classes of labourers is described by Lord Selborne, in his despatch of 18th September last, published in Cd. 2786, as being similar, but there is the substantial difference that the Chinese labourers are brought in under the terms of the Labour Importation Ordinances, which place them under certain special restrictions and disabilities.

Chinese Translation of the Repatriation Proclamation.

MR. VERNEY (Buckinghamshire, N.): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will make investigations as to the translation into Chinese of the recent repatriation proclamation in South Africa, and will he have any inaccuracies rectified in England; will he, in case any further proclamation is issued which has to be translated, have that translation made in this country by those who can be trusted to do it accurately; and whether he will take means to secure that the authorised Chinese version, and none other, shall be used.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) Inquiry will be made as to the variation between the recent translation of the proclamation and the terms as read by me to the House.

Wages in Royal Dockyards.

MR. J. WILLIAMS BENN (Devonport): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether, in view of the official inquiry now proceeding in order to make the wages in the Royal dockyards equal, all things considered, to those which obtain outside, he proposes to make any inquiry, privately or otherwise, into the wages and conditions of the men in the Navy who, owing to the nature of their engagement, do not benefit from the action of trades union organisations.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) There is no analogy between dockyard employment and service in the Royal Navy. From time to time the conditions of service among the various classes of men employed in the Navy are investigated, but no reason is seen for holding any special inquiry at the present time.

Arming of the "County" Class of Cruisers.

MR. NIELD: To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he will state what would be the cost of bringing the armament of the ten cruisers of the "County" class up to the strength necessary to render them fit to engage in action with contemporary armoured vessels of other Powers; and whether, having regard to their small fighting value, as at present armed, compared with the cost to the nation of building and maintaining them in commission, it would be cheaper to incur the additional outlay necessary to constitute them efficient armoured cruisers than to leave them in their present condition.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) The cost of re-arming and protecting with thicker armour cruisers of the "County" class would be prohibitive, and its effect would probably be seriously to reduce their speed. As regards the second part of the Question, the reply is in the negative.

Chatham Dockyard Discharges.

Mr. E. H. LAMB (Rochester): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if he will give an assurance that no further discharges shall take place at Chatham Dockyard during the current year, ending March 31st, 1907.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) No such assurance can be given; but it is not anticipated that more discharges other than those already arranged for will take place.

Chatham Dockyard and the Repair of H.M.S. "Montagu."

Mr. E. H. LAMB: To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if H.M.S. "Montagu" may be brought to Chatham Dockyard for repair in the event of her being refloated.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) Chatham is not considered a suitable dockyard for the repair of the "Montagu.'

The Hyde Park Fountains.

Mr. LLOYD MORGAN (Carmarthenshire, W.): To ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he will state the number of days in each year since January 1st, 1900, on which the fountains at the north end of the Serpentine have played; and what has been the annual cost of their repair and maintenance during the same period, and the initial cost, and upon whom it fell.

(Answered by Mr. Harcourt.) The fountains usually play from Easter to the end of September, but no register is kept of the actual number of days. There is no record of the initial cost of the fountains, and I regret that I am unable to furnish the annual cost of maintenance, as the pumps which work these fountains supply also the Round Pond and the Serpentine.

Procedure Committee—Date of next Meeting.

Mr. BLAKE (Longford, S.): To ask the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton, as Chairman of the Select Committee on Procedure of the House of Commons, when he proposes to call together the Committee for the prosecution of the reference.

(Answered by Sir Henry Fowler.) I am trying to arrange an early day for the next meeting of the Committee.

Maintenance and Work of the Imperial Institute.

Mr. LAIDLAW (Renfrewshire, E.): To ask the President of the Board of Trade, having regard to the fact that the charges for the internal maintenance of the Imperial Institute buildings are borne out of funds administered by the Imperial Institute and the University of London, whether he will give a detailed statement showing the yearly income of the Imperial Institute and the sources from which it is derived; and whether, as the institute belongs to the nation, and the cost of the external maintenance of the institute buildings is borne from public funds, he will direct the submission to Parliament of an annual report on the institute, accompanied by a detailed statement of its receipts and expenditure, thus following the practice adopted in respect to the Indian Section.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) A report on the work of the Imperial Institute at South Kensington during 1905, with a financial statement, will shortly be presented to Parliament.

Staff of the Imperial Institute.

Mr. LAIDLAW: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the staff of the Imperial Institute is recruited in the ordinary way by the Civil Service Commission or by private patronage.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) No members of the Imperial Institute staff are established Civil Servants, and consequently they are not engaged through the Civil Service Commission.

Checking of the Board of Trade Customs Returns.

MR. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that practically no entries in the Free Import Registers at the Statistical Department of His Majesty's Customs had been checked for about four years, until the 12th June, 1906, and that the checking of the entries in the British export registers had been intermittent and cursory; and whether, in view of the importance of the Board of Trade Returns of Imports and Exports, and the need for accuracy and reliability, he will take steps to ensure an adequate and efficient supervising staff for the Statistical Office, seeing that during the past ten years, in consequence of the large and important amplification of the returns, the total staff has increased over 60 per cent., while the supervising staff, many of whom have been brought into the Statistical Office possessing no knowledge of statistical work, is considerably less than that in 1895.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) I am informed that during the past four years entries have been checked from time to time into the Free Import and British Export Registers, and, in addition, further checks are, and have been applied at various stages of the work in the course of each month, the whole being considered sufficient to insure reasonable accuracy in the accounts. The staff of the Statistical Office in 1895 consisted of 163 persons. Of this number forty-eight were of higher rank than abstractor, while five of the latter rank were in receipt of checking allowances. But the supervising staff was then considered to be in excess of requirements, and the number was in consequence in course of reduction. At the present time the staff consists of 236 persons. Of this number thirty-three are above the rank of abstractor, while thirty-two of the latter grade are now in receipt of checking allowances. The existing supervising staff, together with the checking abstractors, is considered by the Commissioners of Customs to be sufficient to provide for the necessary checking.

Increased Charge for Ordnance Maps.

MR. LLOYD MORGAN: To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether he will state the reason for the increased charge from 1s. to 1s. 6d. per sheet for Ordnance maps: whether he will state what the result has been of increasing the charge by fifty per cent. on the sale of the maps during the last five years as compared with the sale for the five years previous to the increase of price.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) In order to cover the cost of production it was found necessary to increase the price of the small scale maps which are mounted on linen, but the price of the same maps unmounted and folded in a cover, has not been altered. The change was only made in January, 1905, and no comparison for five years can therefore be given.

British Forestry.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, what steps have been taken to carry into effect the recommendation of the Departmental Committee of 1902 on British Forestry; and whether any communication has been addressed to corporations and municipalities relative to the Committee's recommendation as to the desirability of planting with trees the catchment areas of their water supply.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) 1. The Departmental Committee recommended that the Alice Holt Woods in Hampshire should be made available as soon as possible to serve as a demonstration area in England. This has been done. A full report as to the past history, present position, and future management of these woods has been prepared by Dr. Schlich at the request of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and the recommendations made therein are being systematically carried out. A certain amount of experimental planting has already taken place. Copies of Dr. Schlich's report, illustrated by plans, can be had on application to the Commissioners. It was also recommended that a suitable estate should be purchased in Scotland to serve as another demonstration area. Several properties have been brought to the notice of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, but, for various reasons, they did not appear suitable for the purpose. Two additional properties are now under consideration, and as soon as a suitable estate has been found the Treasury will be approached with a view to purchase. 2. The recommendation of the Departmental Committee that lecturers should appointed at Oxford and Cambridge has to some extent been met by the augmentation of the salary of the Sibthorpian Professor of Rural Economy at Oxford, who is now the Professor of Forestry Botany. It is understood that an estate will be placed at his disposal for demonstration purposes. 3. A sum of £500 a year, which was placed by the Treasury at the disposal of the Board for the establishment of lectureships in forestry, has been allocated to the University College of North Wales at Bangor and the Armstrong College at Newcastle-on-Tyne. The results have been most encouraging. A considerable number of students have been found desirous of taking a full collegiate course of study, good classes of practical foresters and others have been conducted at selected local centres, while there has been a constant demand on the part of landowners for expert advice from the lecturer. 4. A school for working woodmen has been established by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests in the Forest of Dean, and is now in the third year of its existence. From eighteen to twenty youths are receiving instruction. 5. Legislation would be necessary to remove the inequality in the levy of the estate duty on timber, and it has not been possible hitherto to take any steps in this direction. The matter has, however, not been lost sight of. 6. The Railway Fires Act, 1905, which comes into force on the 1st January 1908, will give some protection to owners of woods against loss by fire caused by sparks from locomotives. 7. Special inquiries were made in 1905, with a view of ascertaining the extent of land now occupied by woods in Great Britain, and the results have been published in the Agricultural Returns for that year. The three categories suggested by the Departmental Committee were adopted. 8. With the object of ascertaining the districts in which local authorities have developed the catchment area of their water supplies by afforestation, the Board communicated with the Local Government Boards for England and Scotland, who sent out a circular letter to all local authorities asking for a Return. The results were tabulated and published in the journal of the Board of Agriculture for November 1904. A leaflet on the relation of Woods to Domestic Water Supply was published in January 1904, and a large number of copies have been issued. The Board are keeping the various recommendations of the Departmental Committee steadily in view, and they hope to be able from time to time to proceed further in the directions indicated in their Report.

Payment of School Grants.

SIR CARNE RASCH (Essex, Chelmsford): To ask the President of the Board of Education, whether he has considered the representation made to him by the elementary education authorities of the inconvenience caused by withholding payment of the annual grant until the expiration of the school year; whether he contemplates the resumption of quarterly payments; and, if so, when.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) As I stated in reply to an oral Question from the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, on February 22nd last,† the annual grant has never been paid on a regular system of quarterly instalments. Ever since the first establishment of the annual grant, forty years ago, it has not been paid until after the close of the school year, and I am not aware that any confusion has thereby been occasioned. It has only been within the last three financial years that a partial and essentially temporary expedient has been resorted to by which certain limited sums have been paid in advance. The representations made to the Board on this matter have been fully considered in conjunction with the Treasury. The resumption of quarterly payments is not contemplated, but a careful investigation is being made by a special committee, appointed for the purpose, to consider whether some re-arrangement of the scheme of paying grants in respect of elementary education cannot be effected, under which the sums payable to local authorities may in future be more evenly distributed throughout the financial year. But the problem is an extremely difficult one, and I must not be supposed to be holding out any substantial expectation that it can be solved this year, in view of all the circumstances.

National Gallery and the Chantrey Bequest Fund.

MR. MIDDLEMORE (Birmingham, N.): To ask the Prime Minister whether the Government or the trustees of the National Gallery, or both of these bodies, have the power to refuse to hang pictures, which may be offered them for that purpose by the trustees of the Chantrey Bequest Fund, if they consider such pictures unsuitable for permanent exhibition; and whether they have power to return to the trustees such pictures as they may consider it to be unadvisable to retain.

(Answered by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.) The Treasury letter of 11th November, 1898, to the Royal Academy gave the trustees of the National Gallery no power to reject Chantrey pictures; and by a letter of 29th November 1898 the trustees concurred in the Treasury arrangement.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

German Naval Programme.

MR. BEAUCHAMP (Suffolk, Lowestoft): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he has any official information showing that the two new German battleships to be laid down will have a displacement of 19,000 tons instead of 18,000, as intimated in the preamble to the German Naval Estimates.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON, Dundee): There is no official information on this point.

Admiralty Contracts and Trades Union Wages.

MR. KEIR HARDIE (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether Messrs. Richards, Limited, Aberdeen, are on the list of contractors for this Department; whether he is aware that the wages earned by their women workers are in some cases as low as 3s. 4d. per week, and the average for the firm is 7s. 6d. per week; that sixty of the women have been discharged for having joined a trade union, and have been told that they will only be reinstated on giving an undertaking to withdraw from the union; and what action he proposes taking in the matter.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: Messrs. Richards, Limited, are on the Admiralty list of contractors. No complaint has hitherto been received as to the rates of wages paid by this firm, but inquiries will be made.

Gun Practice in the Thames Estuary.

MR. WHITEHEAD (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what steps he has taken to prevent such firing from Sheerness into the navigable channels of the Thames estuary as occurred early in May last.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BUCHANAN, Perthshire, E.): It is the navigable channels of the Thames that the guns at Sheerness are intended to protect. And if any useful practice with these guns is to be carried out it is manifestly impossible to avoid firing over these channels. Strict safety regulations are laid down and observed, and no shot is fired over any water when there are vessels in dangerous proximity. The Secretary of State believes that every possible precaution against the possibility of danger is taken by the responsible officers concerned.

Shoebury Battery Gun Practice.

MR. WHITEHEAD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the fact that on June 4th, when a party of nine persons in a bawley from Leigh-on-Sea were fishing off South Shoebury gas buoy, west of the Admiralty beacon, and outside the sands, a shot from Shoebury battery struck the water not more than twenty yards from the bow of the boat; whether this was done in conformity with the amended regulations issued by the Secretary of State last month; and whether he will make further Amendments to the regulations, and will issue further and effective instructions to the responsible officer at Shoebury in order to avoid all risk to the public using the estuary.

MR. BUCHANAN: Careful inquiry has been made, but no information of any occurrence of the kind on the day mentioned has been received. The precautions under the regulations, which are of a very strict nature, were in force, as on all other occasions, throughout the firing on that day. Expert officers and non-commissioned officers are specially on duty to see the regulations carried out. None of these officers or non-commissioned officers observed or heard of any such occurrence.

MR. WHITEHEAD: If I satisfy the hon. Gentleman that this event actually took place, will more stringent regulations be issued?

MR. BUCHANAN: I will inquire further, of course, if the hon. Gentleman can give me additional information.

Ireland and Army Meat Contracts.

MR. EDWARD BARRY (Cork, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has received a Resolution recently adopted by a Committee representing the cattle trade of the southern half of Ireland, strongly protesting against the recent innovation in the tender forms for the supply of meat to the Army, whereby the words "home-killed" are substituted for "home-fed" as hitherto specified; and, if so, will steps be taken to revert to the old form of tender when contracts are being taken for supplying the Army with meat.

MR. BUCHANAN: Several representations from Ireland have reached the Secretary of State, but he is not able to identify the particular Resolution to which the hon. Member refers. As the Secretary of State has already said, it is not proposed to revert to the old form of tender.

The Unrest in Bengal.

MR. O'GRADY (Leeds, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether, in view of the action of the Lieutenant-Governor of Eastern Bengal and Assam, in dispersing by force the Bengal Provincial Conference, in preventing and breaking up peaceful and religious processions, in interfering with municipal commissioners and honorary magistrates and other persons who are in favour of the Swadeshi movement, in the frequent prosecution of schoolboys and in other measures, he proposes to hold an inquiry by means of a Commission, or otherwise, in order to devise means of allaying the unrest which now prevails in the new Province.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. MORLEY, Montrose Burghs): As I stated in reply to a Question on May 14th,† it is the wish and the intention of the Government to take such measures as may seem most likely to allay unrest. But I am not at all disposed to think that a Commission is necessary, nor do I think that it would be desirable.

Railway Rates from Delagoa Bay.

MR. O'GRADY: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he is aware that an agreement was entered into between Lord Milner and the Portuguese Government providing that in return for permission to recruit native labour for the mines in the Transvaal from Portuguese territory, a preference in railway rates was arranged for goods being sent up country from Delagoa Bay to Johannesburg; whether his attention has been called to the statement contained in the report of the Port Elizabeth Chamber of Commerce to the effect that the preference in railway rates from Delagoa Bay as against East London and Durban ranges from 10s. to 15s. per ton; and what action he proposes to take in the matter.

The UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. CHURCHILL, Manchester, N.W.): The Secretary of State is aware of the facts referred to by the hon. Member, and the matter is at present forming the subject of negotiation with the Portuguese Government.

Repatriation Proclamation.

MR. GOOCH (Bath): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the attention of the Secretary of State for the Colonies has been called to a translation of the Repatriation Proclamation, which has recently appeared, containing a concluding sentence ordering the Chinese in threatening terms to tremble and obey; whether this sentence was actually posted in the compounds; and, if so, why it was omitted from the version read to the House.

MR. CHURCHILL: The version which I read to the House was that supplied to the Secretary of State by the High Commissioner before the notice was posted at the mines, and I need scarcely add that it was to the best of my belief a true and complete version in every respect. Inquiry will now be made upon both the translations from English into Chinese and back again from Chinese into English to ascertain whether they have gained anything in substance or style during either operation.

MR. VERNEY (Buckinghamshire, N.) asked whether in the case of any further proclamation the translation would be made in this country by those who could be trusted, and whether the hon. Gentleman would take care that the authorised Chinese translation, and no other, would be used in future.

MR. CHURCHILL: The course we shall take with regard to any further proclamation must necessarily depend on the result of our inquiries into the first.

MR. BOTTOMLEY (Hackney, S.): Is it not a fact that every Chinese authority in London who has been consulted differs in his version of the proclamation?

[No Answer was returned].

Zulu Prisoners and the Kimberley Mines.

MR. BYLES (Salford, N.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Zulu prisoners charged with rebellion are being drafted to Kimberley; and whether the object is to send them into the diamond mines.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Secretary of State is not aware that any natives concerned in the recent outbreaks in Natal and Zululand are employed, or are likely to be employed, upon the Kimberley diamond mines. A number of long-sentence prisoners have been removed from Natal to the Cape Colony to make room in Natal gaols for persons awaiting trial upon charges of rebellion. Such a proceeding is entirely within the competence of the Natal and Cape Colony Governments and under the sanction of their laws.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Kimberley mines are worked by convicts, and is there not a danger that these prisoners may be utilised by the Cape Government for that purpose?

MR. CHURCHILL: I am aware that convict labour is used in the mines.

MR. J. WARD (Stoke-on-Trent) asked whether the hon. Gentleman would make such representation to the authorities in South Africa as would prevent the possibility of such an occurrence as the hiring out of political prisoners to the monopolists of the diamond mines.

MR. CHURCHILL: I will bring the opinion which has been expressed by the hon. Member to the notice of the Secretary of State.

The Native Rebellion in South Africa.

MR. BYLES: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if his official reports show that the death of the native chief Bambaata, now officially reported, will tend to check the alleged rebellion, or to increase the native disaffection in South Africa.

MR. CHURCHILL: The news which the Secretary of State has received shows that the Natal Government believe that the native disturbance will shortly be at an end; and that the death in action of the native chief Bambaata will prove to have aided and accelerated its conclusion.

Martial Law in Natal.

MR. BYLES: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether now that some rebel chiefs have been killed while others have surrendered, and the native levies has been disbanded, there will be an immediate termination of the state of martial law in Natal.

MR. CHURCHILL: It is a matter for the Natal Ministers to decide how soon the state of martial law in that Colony may be terminated.

MR. BYLES asked whether His Majesty's Government would request the Government of Natal to abolish martial law at least in those provinces where they did not consider military operations necessary.

MR. CHURCHILL: The inconvenience resulting from martial law in Natal falls wholly on the people of that Colony, and I cannot conceive that they would be willing to subject themselves to its onerous provisions a day longer than public safety demands.

MR. BYLES: I am not quite satisfied yet. Do the Government not consider that our responsibility to the native population imposes on us the duty of protecting them from the illegal tribunal under martial law?

*MR. SPEAKER: That is rather an argumentative Question.

The Macedonian Budget.

MR. LYNCH (Yorkshire, W.R., Ripon): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can state the amount of the deficit in the Macedonian Budget for 1905, and the amount expended on military and on civil expenditure respectively; and whether he can give similar figures for 1904, and any estimate made by the Financial Commission for 1906 under the above heads.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RUNCIMAN, Dewsbury; for Sir EDWARD GREY): The deficit in the Macedonian Budget for the year ending March 13th, 1906, was £687,855. The military expenditure for the same year was £1,303,161, and the civil expenditure £678,223. The deficit on the Macedonian Budget for the year ending March 13th, 1907, has been estimated at £747,778. The military expenditure for the same year has been estimated at £1,344,690, a reduction of £636,210 on that of 1904, and the civil expenditure at £768,697. The Financial Commission have not furnished any statistics for the year ending March 13th, 1905.

Massacres of Jews in Russia—British Opinion.

MR. STUART SAMUEL (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will inform the Government of Russia, prior to any steps being taken to establish closer ties of friendship with this country, of the views held by the British people concerning the massacre of Jews in Russia.

MR. RUNCIMAN: The impression which has been made, and the sympathy which has been aroused, not only in this country, but everywhere, by disturbances and loss of life in Russia, is well-known to the Russian Government, and these are not matters in which official diplomatic intervention is usual or desirable.

Experiments on Living Animals.

MR. SMEATON (Stirlingshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the inspector's Returns of experiments on living animals, which are now overdue, are likely to be laid before the House; and whether he can see his way to expedite their submission.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): This Return is now in the printer's hands, and it is hoped that it may be available by the beginning of next week.

Workmen's Compensation Insurances.

MR. WEDGWOOD (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether in view of the difficulty of insuring compensation to some of the new classes compensated for accident and disease by the present Workmen's Compensation Bill, based on individual responsibility, and in view of the unnecessary expense to which employers and the community are put by individual insurance with private companies, he will take steps to set up or advise a Royal Commission to consider the possibilities of collective or State insurance based on collective responsibility.

*MR. GLADSTONE : I must refer the hon. Member to the speech I made on the Second Reading of the Bill† when the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean, moved, "that this House desires such recognition and guarantee of insurance as to prevent the defeat of legal expectation of compensation created under the law." I have nothing to add to the statement I then made.

Prussian Cigarette Makers.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any information respecting the expulsion of some 1,000 alien cigarette makers from Prussia ; and whether any considerable number of these persons are likely to come to this country.

*MR. GLADSTONE : I have no information on the statement contained in the Question. Perhaps my hon. friend will let me have any particulars on the subject which have come to his notice.

Convicts' Licences.

MR. PICKERSGILL : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the dismissal, last week, by the magistrate at the Thames Police Court, of a charge of failing to report brought by the police against an ex-convict on licence ; and whether, having regard to the fact that the publicity of such a charge destroys a man's chance of earning an honest livelihood, he will instruct the police that a public prosecution for such an offence is not to follow as a matter of course, but that a proper discretion must be exercised.

*MR. GLADSTONE : The hon. Member's suggestion represents the existing practice. Licence-holders who fail to report are not prosecuted as a matter of course. Every case is carefully considered on its merits, and the licence-holder is not charged if he can show any sufficient excuse for his failure to report. If there is any reason to think that a licence-holder was genuinely trying to make an honest living, this would have much weight in his favour. In nearly 50 per cent. of the cases where an ex-convict fails to report and is apprehended, police court proceedings are not taken. In the present case, after inquiry into the facts, I am satisfied that the charge was properly brought. In these circumstances no fresh instructions to the Police appear to me to be necessary.

Merchandise Marks.

MR. SEDDON (Lancashire, Newton) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the evasion of the Merchandise Marks Act by the importation of parts of watches which do not bear the mark of the country of origin ; and whether he can apply the Act to the goods stated.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE, Carnarvon Boroughs) : I am aware of the importations referred to, but the Merchandise Marks Act, while prohibiting the application of false trade descriptions, nowhere prescribes the marking of all foreign made goods imported. If, however, the question relates to the fraudulent sale as English of watches made up of foreign made parts, the Board of Trade had been in communication with representatives of the watch trade, and have assured them that if a specific case is submitted to them in accordance with the regulations under the Merchandise Marks Act, it will be carefully considered.

MR. PAUL (Northampton) asked whether the Merchandise Marks Act had not served as a gratuitous advertisement for cheap foreign goods.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE : I am sorry to say I believe that has been the case up to the present moment.

Glamorgan Education Authority.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): On behalf of the hon. Member for Gravesend, I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether his attention has been called to an attempt made by the Glamorgan education authority to utilise the labour certificate examinations as a test of general school efficiency; and whether this action is compatible with the regulations of the Board of Education, and what steps the Board propose to take to safeguard the educational interests of the schools.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N.): My attention has been called to this matter and the local education authority has been informed that the Board of Education cannot accede to any arrangement by which His Majesty's Inspectors' examinations of individual children in a school for labour certificates shall be converted into a general examination of the whole school.

Government Amendments to the Education Bill—Clause 4.

SIR WILLIAM ANSON (Oxford University): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education how soon the House will be in possession of the Amendments, or any of them, which the Government propose to make in the Education Bill.

MR. BIRRELL: I will see that the Government's new provisions in respect of Clause 4 will appear amongst the Amendments circulated on Saturday morning.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) asked if, to afford opportunity for consideration of the Amendments before entering upon discussion of Clause 4 and to allow notice of Amendments to the Amendments, should such appear desirable, the Government proposals could be made known to the House on Friday.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said this was a reasonable request, and he would do his best to have the Amendments to the clause put on the Paper on Thursday night. But, of course, he could give no definite promise.

Sheep Scab in Northumberland.

MR. TREVELYAN (Yorkshire, W.R., Elland): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether, in view of the limited character of the outbreaks of sheep scab of recent years in Northumberland, he will consider the sufficiency for the purpose of stamping out the disease of enforcing drastic fines and penalties on farms where the disease is discovered, instead of continuing in force the Sheep Dipping (North of England) Order of 1906, which is applicable to all farms, whether affected or not, and is a source of widespread irritation.

SIR EDWARD STRACHEY (Somersetshire, S.): The suggestion made by my hon. friend was considered by the Departmental Committeee on Sheep Scab and also by the Board, but legislation would be necessary in order to carry it into effect, and I am afraid that the proposal is not one which would commend itself to Parliament.

Sheep Dipping (North of England) Order.

MR. TREVELYAN: I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether the attention of the Board has been called to the effect of the Sheep Dipping (North of England) Order, which requires that sheep which have been dipped on or shortly before July 31st shall be dipped a second time before they can be sent to market or out of the dipping area after August 31st, unless they shall have been kept isolated; whether he is aware that sheep cannot be kept isolated on the hills of Northumberland, because often there are no fences; whether he is further aware that to dip lambs twice, with only a short period between the dippings, is likely to cause them serious injury; and whether he proposes to take any action in the matter.

SIR EDWARD STRACHEY: The value of the dipping would be destroyed if sheep which have been dipped are not kept separate from undipped sheep, and I am afraid therefore that we cannot agree to any modification of the Order in this respect. The difficulty referred to is, however, one that can be met by the mutual co-operation of the flock-masters of the county. There is nothing in the Order which makes it necessary for lambs to be dipped twice within a dangerously short period.

Irish Tenant Right.

MR. GINNELL: I beg to ask Mr. Attorney-General for Ireland in view of the fact that the tenants' right to protection of his occupation, interest, and improvements in his holding under the Land Act of 1881 exists as a rule, and that cases in which it does exist are exceptional, will he state why the legality of confiscating that property under the Land Act of 1903 has not been tested before now; and what is the reason for leaving unsettled a question which arises in connection with almost every sale under this Act.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. CHERRY, Liverpool, Exchange): The Act of 1903, as I have several times reminded the hon. Member, deals with voluntary agreements between landlord and tenant only. The legality of confiscating the property of tenants or of any other class in the community does not and cannot arise in connection with any sale under the Act.

MR. GINNELL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that for twenty-five years the law of the land has stood between landlords and tenants for the purpose of protecting the tenant from these so-called voluntary arrangements?

MR. CHERRY: That may be so, but the Act of 1903 especially authorises them.

Dog Licences.

MR. McKILLOP (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney-General for Ireland what is the practice in the petty sessions districts of Holywood, Bangor, and Newtownbreda with regard to the stamping of dogs' licences where more than one dog appears in one licence; what is the practice in these districts as to the cancellation of stamps; whether the number of dogs licenced in the above districts corresponded during the present and preceding year with the stamps affixed to the licences issued; whether the petty sessions clerk of the districts duly accounted, and, if so, when did he account; and whether the petty sessions clerk of these districts, in his accounting statement for these years, set forth such particulars as would show the instances in which he did not affix stamps in respect of dogs licenced, and the instances in which he only affixed stamps for one dog on licenses in which more than one dog appeared.

MR. CHERRY: The Registrar of Petty Sessions Clerks informs me that every petty sessions clerk is charged each year with the number of stamps which should have been placed on dog licences, as shown in the Register of Dog Licences. In this register is shown the number of licences issued and the number of dogs in each licence. The number of stamps paid for by the petty sessions clerk of Holywood, Bangor, and Newtownbreda, agrees with the number of licences issued and dogs licensed in the years 1905 and 1906. The petty sessions clerk was absent at Quarter Sessions during some days of the dog licensing period and the person acting for him neglected to affix a second dog stamp in some cases in which two dogs appeared in the same licence. The clerk subsequently returned to the head office dog stamps amounting to £4 12s. 0d., stating that these were on his hands in excess of the proper amount. He had already been charged for these stamps and they were destroyed. All stamps affixed to dog licences should be cancelled on issue, but it is impossible to use them a second time under any circumstances.

Irish Land Purchase—Cappaloughlin Estate, Queen's County.

MR. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that agreements to purchase their holdings have been signed by the tenants on the Cappaloughlin, Queen's County, estate of the Endowed Board of Commissioners on terms of twenty-three and twenty-five years' purchase, including one year's rent to November last, turf banks and cutaway bog also included, and that the tenants have since been informed by the agent, Mr. Franks, that they will be required to pay in addition for the turbary rights, in consequence of which a minority of the tenants have withdrawn from the sale; and will he see that the Estates Commissioners shall inquire into this matter before sanctioning the sale.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): The Estates Commissioners inform me that they are unable to identify the estate referred to as one in which proceedings for sale have been instituted before them. If the estate should come before them, they will make enquiries into the facts alleged in the Question.

MR. KILBRIDE (Kildare, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman inform the Estates Commissioners that the terms agreed on are six or seven years' purchase in advance of the average terms under the Act.

MR. BRYCE: I am willing to send to the Commissioners any information which the hon. Member thinks should be conveyed to them.

Longfield Estate, Mallow.

MR. FLYNN (Cork County, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have any information as to the proposed sale of the Longfield estate, Ballyclough, near Mallow; and whether, in view of the fact that the landlord, Mr. R. E. Longfield, retains in his own hands the evicted farm of a man Lehane, the Estates Commissioners will decline to sanction the purchase agreement unless Denis Lehane, son of the evicted tenant, is reinstated on the lands now let to graziers.

MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that an originating application in respect of the sale of the estate in question was lodged with them on 9th February, 1906. The case of Denis Lehane will be duly considered when the estate is being dealt with. The Commissioners have already approached the landlord's agent on Lehane's behalf, but have been informed that the owner is not willing to sell the holding in which Lehane seeks to be reinstated, seeing that this holding is now incorporated in the owner's farm and demesne.

Mallow Evicted Tenant.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, in reference to the case of Mr. Timothy O'Callaghan, Dromahane, Mallow, who was excluded from the purchase arrangement on the Newman estate, and since evicted from his holding, whether the Estates Commissioners have received a reply to the statement made by Mr. Newman, and which they transmitted to the tenant; and, if so, whether, having regard to all the facts of the case, they are still of opinion that they should have excluded this holding from a large estate merely on the representation of the landlord that he intended to resume possession; and what steps the Commissioners propose to take in the matter.

MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that the matter referred to in the Question is still under their consideration, and as various questions of law may be involved which may be found to require judicial decision, they are unable to make any statement in regard to it.

MR. FLYNN: Although this Question referred to an individual case, I put it down for oral Answer, because I think the Estate Commissioners in this matter have acted entirely outside the scope of their duty.

Irish Intermediate Board of Education Rules.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, under the Act of 1878 constituting the Intermediate Education Board for Ireland, the Rules of that body must lie upon the Table of this House for forty days before they can come into operation; and whether, seeing that secondary schools commence their school year some time about the middle of August and others in the beginning of September, and require to know some time beforehand what programme has been definitely decided on by the Board and that only a short time remains if the Rules are to lay upon the Table for forty days and come into operation some short time before the commencement of the school year, he will give notice to the Board that they adopt the Resolutions of this House and publish the revised Rules within a week, or, if not, that they must resign their posts, and that he will appoint a small provisional board to carry on secondary education until inquiry is made and a scheme adopted for placing a primary, secondary, and technical education in the hands of one board appointed by and responsible to the Irish people.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.): At the same time may I ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the refusal of the Commissioners of Intermediate Education to submit new rules for the forthcoming examinations, he proposes to ask the House of Commons to rescind the Resolution which was adopted on Monday, May 21st?†

*MR. BRYCE: The fact is as stated in the first part of the Question. Since I answered a Question on this subject last week, the Board of Intermediate Education have informed the Irish Government that they find it impossible to prepare a new set of rules in time to enable them to be approved by the Lord-Lieutenant and lie forty days on the Table of both Houses before August; and that as the gravest inconvenience would be caused to the numerous schools which prepare pupils for the Board's examinations if the programme of those examinations were not announced by the month of August, they conceive that the only course open to them is to continue the previously existing programme, viz., that prepared in 1905 to be in force for 1906. They accordingly propose to submit to the Lord-Lieutenant for his approval the rules for 1906 that they may be in operation for 1907. This is a purely temporary expedient, rendered necessary, in the opinion of the Board, by the shortness of the time available. It is hoped that the rules may be laid before Parliament in the time sufficient to enable the secondary schools to go on with their work of preparation in the usual way. In answer to the Question of the hon. Member for Mid. Armagh I have only to add that it is not the case that the Commissioners have refused to submit new rules.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Arising out of that reply I should like to ask whether the fact that the right hon. Gentleman has now communicated to the House is the first answer sent in by the Board, or whether it is a fact, as stated in a leading Dublin newspaper, that the Board by a large majority declined to submit to the unanimous decision of the House of Commons, and absolutely refused to alter their rules; also whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the alteration proposed by this House is so simple that there could be no difficulty in carrying it into effect.

*MR. BRYCE: I have stated in my answer to the hon. Gentleman, which I regret has not yet been circulated, as I intended it should have been, that communications were passing on the whole subject between the Government and the Commissioners of Intermediate Education, and I cannot make any statement as to the correspondence. I am bound to say that from the communications that passed, it is quite true that it would be more difficult than it appears at first sight to draw up a new set of rules consistent with the view that the Commissioners entertain, and considering the extreme technicality of the system under which these intermediate examinations are worked. I did not know until I looked into the matter how highly technical it is, and I can understand the difficulty.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL asked whether upon the Board receiving notice that the rules were to be changed in three points of importance, the delay arose not because of the difficulty itself, but purely and simply because the Nationalist representatives wanted to have Irish put on an equality with French and German.

*MR. BRYCE: I do not think the latter part of the hon. Member's Question is well founded. I think there is a real difficulty.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL asked whether, if they agreed to allow the third part of the changes dealing with domestic economy to stand over for another year, the right hon. Gentleman would guarantee that Irish should be placed in the position they desired.

† See (4) Debates, clvii., 1072.

*MR. BRYCE: I am sorry to say I cannot guarantee anything. The hon. Member seems to suppose that the rules are made by the Irish Government. They are not.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): May I ask whether it is not a fact that the delay renders it impossible for the Commissioners to submit these amended rules in time to lay them upon the Table of the House for forty days before August, whether the delay of three weeks which has already taken place is not entirely due to the Commissioners themselves; and, secondly, will the right hon. Gentleman state how it is if there is not time to put the amended rules upon the Table there will be time to put last year's rules upon the Table. Why cannot the amended rules be laid as well as last year's rules?

*MR. BRYCE: I am afraid I have failed to explain the matter sufficiently. It is an extremely difficult thing to fit into their general scheme the alterations which have to be made in order to comply with the Resolution of the House. They are of course willing to comply with the directions of this House, but find extreme difficulty in doing so. I think that is quite true, and if hon. Members would look into this matter they would understand that it is so. As regards the first part of the Question I do not think a certain amount of delay could be avoided, considering the position in which the Board was placed by the decision of this House.

MR. DILLON: Is it not a fact that the real difficulty arises from the decision of the Commissioners to defy the decision of this House; and, further, is it not a fact that the decision of the Commissioners was communicated by them to a Dublin newspaper and published three weeks ago?

*MR. BRYCE: I know nothing whatever about a Dublin newspaper. I have not seen it and I do not think it is fair to the Board to say that that is the cause of the delay. The matter is one of very great difficulty, and I can quite understand it.

MR JOHN REDMOND: The right hon. Gentleman has no control over this Board, but the House is entitled to ask whether the Board, after the decision of this House, passed a Resolution defying the action of the House?

*MR. BRYCE: I have already stated that pending the completion of the correspondence that is going on between the Board and the Irish Government I ought to make no further statement on the point.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: Is that acting fairly to the House of Commons? It decided by a unanimous vote a certain thing, and I ask whether one of these Irish Boards for which the right hon. Gentleman is not responsible passed a Resolution defying the action of this House.

*MR. BRYCE: That might be stated if they were defying the action of the House, but their communication to the Irish Government is one accepting the decision of the House and accepting the rules.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: I am very sorry to have to press this matter. Will the right hon. Gentleman answer—of course if he refuses to do so there is an end of the matter—did the Board, after an unanimous decision of this House, pass a Resolution declining to act upon the decision come to by the House?

*MR. BRYCE: I can make no further statement on the matter. There has been correspondence between the Board and the Irish Government, but I am not now in a position to make any further statement.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL: Will the right hon. Gentleman publish the minutes of the last meeting of the Board?

*MR. BRYCE: No, Sir.

Irish Tenant's Occupation Interest.

MR. GINNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that the accounts of some public salesmen in Ireland show the value of the tenant's occupation interest, including improvements, in an agricultural holding to frequently equal and occasionally exceed the value of the landlord's interest in the holding; and will he ascertain what has been the average price of this tenant's property in normal cases in each county during the last ten years, in order to find a standard for the guidance of the Estates Commissioners and their inspectors.

MR. BRYCE: I am informed by the Estate Commissioners that they have no information as to the matters of fact alleged in the first part of the Question, and have no means of obtaining the particulars asked for in the concluding inquiry.

MR. GINNELL: Will the right hon. Gentleman endeavour to obtain the information?

MR. BRYCE: I am afraid I have no means of doing so. I have no powers over the Estates Commissioners to compel them to give it even if they have it.

MR. GINNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland do all or any of the inspectors on behalf of the Estates Commissioners set forth in their reports in respect of each holding the value of the tenant's occupation, interest and improvement; is this value deducted from the gross value of the holding to find the value of the landlord's interest which is the only object of the sale; is the price calculated upon that interest exclusively; if not, how is the promise kept that the form of report would be adequate for this purpose; and how are the Treasury and the tenant protected from paying for that which is already the tenant's own property.

MR. BRYCE: I beg to refer the hon. and learned Member to the instructions to inspectors which have been laid on the Table of the House. These instructions, and the form of report attached to them, set forth the matters on which the inspectors are required to report. These include the tenant's improvements as admitted, the value thereof, and the estimated gross and net fair rent. I am informed that no report is required as to the value of the tenant's occupation interest, and no deduction from the gross rent is made in respect of such interest. For further elucidation of the matter, so far as it is one of fact and not of argument, I may refer the hon. Member to the Answers given to his Questions of May 14th and 23rd.†

MR. GINNELL: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered my Question whether the tenant pays for his occupation interest in the price of the land.

MR. BRYCE: If the hon. Member will refer to the Answer to his previous Question, he will find my reply to this point. I can add nothing more.

Headfort Evicted Tenants.

MR. MURPHY (Kerry, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have been able to effect any settlement of the claims of Denis Healy and Jeremiah Healy, of Headfort, county Kerry, as evicted tenants.

MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that the Report of their inspector on the McCartie Estate, upon which the persons named seek reinstatement, will come before them for ruling at an early date.

Irish Teachers' Capitation Grants.

MR. MURPHY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can now make a statement as to expediting payments of capitation grants to teachers; if not, what is the cause of the delay; and if it is the case that the reform required in the matter of payment of this money could be carried out with very little difficulty and expense.

MR. BRYCE: The Commissioners of National Education have made arrangements, with the sanction of the Treasury, to pay the annual residual capitation grant to the teachers in the month of April in future, that is to say, immediately after the expiration of the financial year to which the grant relates. The payment of the grant in respect of services rendered by the teachers in the first three months of this year is to be made forthwith.

Irish Land Commission.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether Mr. Wilkinson, who was appointed in December, 1905, to an office in the Collection Department of the Irish Land Commission at a salary of £300 per annum, was an experienced land clerk, possessing skilled practical knowledge of Irish estate accounts; and, if not, what are his special qualifications for the post.

† See (4) Debates, clvii., 197–200, 1291.

MR. BRYCE: I am informed by the Land Commission that the Answer to this Question is in the affirmative.

Irish Land Clerks.

MR. SLOAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland how many Irish land clerks have been employed by the Congested Districts Board since the passing of the Land Act of 1903; and how many clerks and assistants other than land clerks have been employed by the Board in connection with the purchase and management of estates.

MR. BRYCE: I am informed that since the passing of the Land Act of 1903, the Congested Districts Board have engaged one land clerk, who was in the employment of the vendor of an estate which they had purchased. They have also engaged eight other clerks to assist their land inspectors. Two of these have since resigned. Fifteen other temporary clerks have been appointed for estates business in the Dublin Office. The Board have called up for competitive examination every applicant for a temporary clerkship in their Dublin Office, and with one exception all the posts of clerk to land inspectors were filled by competitive examination of persons who had applied for employment.

MR. SLOAN: Is it not the fact that during the debate on the Act of 1902 these land clerks were promised a preference for appointments, provided they made themselves fully qualified, and has not that pledge been completely ignored?

MR. BRYCE: I do not know if that is so. I will look into the matter if the hon. Member will indicate when the pledge was given.

MR. SLOAN: It was given in debate. There was a distinct promise that these land clerks should be given employment, and yet they are now being made to stand aside for the sake of other people.

Ballina Evicted Tenant.

MR. HALPIN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Michael Maloney, of Ballina, Labashuda, county Clare, a tenant on the estate of the Hon. C. W. White, is not yet reinstated in his farm, although it was inspected in April, 1905; whether, seeing that the greater part of the estate is now sold to the tenants, he will inquire what is the cause of the delay in reinstating Mr. Maloney; and at what approximate date will the reinstatement take place.

MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners have made an offer to the land judge for the purchase of the estate in question, but it has not yet been decided whether the offer will be accepted. The Commissioners are considering whether it may be possible to bring about the restoration of Michael Maloney.

Dunmanway Estate—Coolsnagtig Evicted Tenant.

MR. EDWARD BARRY (Cork County, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the negotiations for the sale of the estate of Mr. John Atkins, Dunmanway, are still in progress; whether he is aware that James Murphy, an evicted tenant at Coolsnagtig, is claiming reinstatement in the farm from which he was evicted; and, if so, will the Estates Commissioners refuse to declare the Atkins property an estate unless Murphy be included among the purchasing tenants.

MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that no proceedings for the sale of the estate in question have yet come before them, and they have no knowledge of any negotiations for sale which may be proceeding. The Commissioners have, however, referred the case of James Murphy to one of their inspectors with a view to effecting a settlement.

Irish Land Commission Staff.

MR. SLOAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland how many land clerks have been added to the staffs of the Irish Land Commission since the passing of the Land Act of 1903, and how many of them are second divisional clerks, assistant clerks, third class Land Commission clerks, abstractors, and solicitors' clerks, respectively; and will steps be taken to give effect to the promise of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dover; and to see that a fair proportion of Irish land clerks who have a special knowledge of the Irish land system will not be overlooked in favour of those less qualified.

MR. BRYCE: The Land Commission inform me that two clerks who had previously had considerable experience in land agents' offices have been appointed to the staff of the department since the passing of the Irish Land Act, 1903. One of these gentlemen holds the position of estate management clerk in the Estates Commissioners' office, and the other is assistant to the clerk in charge of the department for the collection of interest in lieu of rent. Neither of these officers belongs to any of the grades of clerks mentioned in the question. The applications of all persons who seek employment in the office of the Land Commission are carefully considered as vacancies arise.

MR. DELANY: Is it right that these land clerks should be recruited from rent offices in Ireland?

MR. BRYCE said he had given what Answer the information in his possession enabled him to give, but he would look further into the matter if desired.

Bandon Estate Evicted Tenants.

MR. EDWARD BARRY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, seeing that the Bandon estate was sold subject to the understanding that evicted tenants on the estate, whether holding directly from the head landlord or middleman, were to be reinstated in their old farms, an inspector has yet visited the farm at Knockmeady, formerly held by Cornelius O'Donoghue; and, if so, has any decision been arrived at regarding the reinstatement of the evicted tenant.

MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that the applications which have been received from evicted tenants on this estate, including that of Cornelius O'Donoghue, have been referred to one of their inspectors for enquiry and report.

Dunmanway Cottage Scheme.

MR. SHEEHAN (Cork County, Mid.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in the recent scheme of cottages promulgated by the Dunmanway Rural District Council, and for which the Provisional Order has now become absolute, the representation of Michael Shea for a cottage and plot of land on the farm formerly occupied by Jeremiah Hallihan, and now held by a man named Cunnell, was amongst those recommended by the Local Government Board inspector; that this applicant proved his claim to be a bona fide and a proper one before the Local Government Board inquiry; and that a majority of the district council since passed a Resolution excluding Shea's application from the scheme; and whether, seeing that Shee's application has been included in the Provisional Order, will the Local Government Board insist that he shall get his cottage and plot of land.

MR. BRYCE: I am informed that the fact is as stated in the first part of the Question. The cottage referred to was authorised by an Order of the Local Government Board in August, 1904. On May 15th, 1906, the rural district council unanimously decided to abandon the proposal to erect this particular cottage, upon the ground that Shea, the original applicant, had gone to America and that the present applicant belongs to the Macroom Union. The Local Government Board do not propose to interfere with the action of the council in the matter.

Bevan Estate, County Limerick.

MR. LUNDON (Limerick, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Bevan estate, situate near Bruff, in the county of Limerick, has come before the Estates Commissioners for sale to the tenants; and whether Messrs. James Butler and James Mulcahy, both evicted tenants on the estate, shall be considered in the purchase negotiations with a view to their reinstatement; or whether the Estates Commissioners will send one of their inspectors to interview the occupant of the holdings, John Van Bevan, to ascertain if he be willing to resign the lands in favour of the evicted tenants Butler and Mulcahy.

Mr. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that no proceedings for the sale of the estate referred to have yet been instituted before them. The Commissioners will, however, have inquiry made into the cases of the two evicted tenants named, both of whom have lodged applications for reinstatement.

Major McBride.

Mr. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether it was with the cognisance and permission of the police authorities that Major McBride was present in Dublin on June 1st.

Mr. BRYCE: I am not aware of any reason why the permission of the police should be necessary to enable Mr. McBride to visit Dublin.

Mr. LONSDALE: Is the right Gentleman aware that Major McBride fought on the side of our enemies in the Boer War and was therefore guilty of high treason?

Mr. BRYCE: I have no information on that point.

Rossmore Evicted Tenants.

Mr. O'SHAUGHNESSY (Limerick, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Simon Morrissey, who was in occupation of the farms of James Murphy and Laurence O'Connell, evicted tenants on the Shelton estate at Rossmore, in the county of Limerick, left the country about two years ago, and that the farms are since derelict; and whether, under these circumstances, the Estates Commissioners will approach the landlord immediately with a view to their reinstatement.

Mr. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have received applications for reinstatement from the persons named, and that they will have the cases duly inquired into by one of their inspectors with a view to effecting a settlement.

Mr. O'SHAUGHNESSY: When will the Inspector make the inquiries?

Mr. BRYCE: I am afraid it is impossible to fix a time, as there is a good deal of work on hand.

Nantenan Evicted Tenant.

Mr. O'SHAUGHNESSY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mrs. Ellen Sheehy, evicted tenant, of Nantenan, in the county of Limerick, has arranged with her landlord to purchase her holding, and that the tenants on the estate have signed agreements to purchase; under these circumstances, will he ask the Estates Commissioners to give her a grant for the purpose of rebuilding the dwelling-house on the evicted farm, which is in ruins, and for stocking and working the land.

Mr. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that, at the request of the vendor, they have intimated the sum they are prepared to advance to Mrs. Sheehy for the purchase of her former holding. The Commissioners are not aware whether an agreement between Mrs. Sheehy and the landlord has yet been arrived at, but if Mrs. Sheehy should become the purchaser of the holding they will consider the question of making her a grant.

Raheen Evicted Tenants.

Mr. O'SHAUGHNESSY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can say whether, having regard to the fact that John Sheehy, William Ryan and Owen Sheehy, of Raheen and Ballinaguile Croagh, in the County of Limerick, who were evicted from their holdings in the years 1884 and 1887, are still out of possession, and that the farms are in the possession of the landlord, Colonel R. Conway, an absentee landlord, he will take steps to see that the Estates Commissioners approach him with a view to bringing about a settlement.

Mr. BRYCE: I have already informed the hon. Member that the Estates Commissioners have received applications for reinstatement from the three persons named, and that the cases will be inquired into by an inspector. Until the inspector's report has been received and considered, the Commissioners are unable to decide what action they may take in these cases. I can assure the hon. Member that the Estates Commissioners are doing their best to deal with all these cases.

Knight of Glin's Estate, Limerick.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, having regard to the fact that there is a number of evicted tenants on the Knight of Glin's estate, in the county of Limerick, who have been out of their holdings for years, he will direct the Estates Commissioners to enter into negotiations with the landlord to bring about their reinstatement.

MR. BRYCE: I beg to refer to my reply to the hon. Member's Question of Wednesday last.† The Estates Commissioners are unable to say what action they may take until they have received and considered their inspector's report.

County Limerick Evicted Tenant.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can say how many applications for reinstatement from evicted tenants in the county of Limerick the Estates Commissioners have received; and what action they have taken in regard to them.

MR. BRYCE: I am informed by the Estates Commissioners that applications have been received from 309 persons seeking reinstatement as evicted tenants in County Limerick. In eighteen cases the applicants did not come within the class of persons mentioned in Section 2 of the Act of 1903. In twenty-six cases the applicants have been reinstated, and the remaining cases will be inquired into by the inspector who has been allocated to the district.

Irish Lord Chancellor's Salary.

MR. FULLERTON (Cumberland, Egremont): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in order to provide additional funds for the Irish Labourers Act, he will reduce the salary of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland to £5,000, the amount received as salary in that capacity by the Lord Chancellor of England.

MR. BRYCE: The Answer is in the negative.

MR. FULLERTON: Why? Are the duties more onerous in the case of the Irish Lord Chancellor than in the case of the Lord High Chancellor of England?

MR. BRYCE: That is a Question of which notice ought to be given.

Emigration from Ireland.

MR. DOLAN (Leitrim, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the number of emigrants from Ireland during the past two months shows an increase over the corresponding figures for last year; and to what cause does he attribute the increase.

MR. BRYCE: It is the case that the number of emigrants from Ireland during the past two months shows an increase over the number for the corresponding period of last year, but I have no information which would enable me to form a definite and positive opinion as to the cause of this increase. There are many causes, some of them operative in America and others here, which influence fluctuations in the number of emigrants.

Labourers Acts Loans—Rates of Interest in the North Dublin District.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin County, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the rate of interest charged to the North Dublin Rural District on loans repayable in fifty years, under the Labourers Acts, is 4¼ per cent., with a sinking fund of 2 per cent., making in all an annual payment of 6¼ per cent.; whether he will give a Return showing the rates of interest and repayment of principal prevalent in all the rural districts of Ireland in respect of labourers; and whether, in view of the rates prevalent in the North Dublin district, and other districts, he will consider the necessity of affording some relief from so heavy a burden.

MR. BRYCE: I am informed that a statement to the effect mentioned in the first part of the Question was made at a recent meeting of the North Dublin

Rural District Council. The fact, however, is that the present annuity upon a loan of £100 repayable in fifty years is £4 17s. 2d. and not £6 5s. 0d., as stated. Since the passing of the original Labourers Act of 1883, loans have been granted from time to time at varying rates of interest having regard to the Treasury rates in force for the time being. The rate of the annuity for a fifty-year loan has, during that period, varied from £4 1s. 6d. to £4 17s. 2d., this rate being dependent on the rate of interest charged, which has varied from 3¼ to 4¼ per cent. A detailed Return such as is suggested would, I am informed, entail a considerable amount of labour without any corresponding advantage. The question of affording relief is one for the Treasury and had better be addressed to a Minister representing that department.

MR. HAYDEN (Roscommon, S.): Cannot the right hon. Gentleman promise a Return which will show in general outline the rates of interest for sinking fund of the whole period of the working of the Labourers Acts? We want a general summary—not a detailed Return.

MR. BRYCE: I will see if that can be done. Perhaps the hon. Member will draw up the form of Return he desires.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): Can the right hon. Gentleman say why, for a loan of £20,000 sanctioned by the Board of Works last December, the interest charged was at the rate of £4 5s. per cent. whereas under the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the charge should be £2 15s. per cent.

MR. BRYCE: I must ask for notice of that Question.

Irish Trade Statistics.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has considered the necessity for adopting means for collecting statistics regarding Ireland's trade with England and foreign countries; and whether, if this cannot be done under the law as it stands, he will introduce a Bill dealing with the matter.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I have already informed the hon. Member in reply to a previous Question that there is no objection to publishing an annual Return if desired giving details of the Import and Export trade of Ireland carried on directly with Foreign Countries and British Possessions and further that the Irish Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction are about to publish certain information as to the cross-channel trade which they have procured through harbour and port authorities. The Board of Trade and Customs Department have no power to require details of the value of the trade of Ireland which is carried on with or through Great Britain, and in view of the grave interference with trade, and of the expense which would be caused by the collection of such statistics, I am not prepared to introduce a Bill for the purpose.

MR. FLYNN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that some twenty years ago the authorities at the Irish customs ports collected these statistics and gave returns of imports and exports?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I will inquire.

Alleged Disorders in the Church of England.

MR. FULLERTON: I beg to ask the Prime Minister what day the Report of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into alleged disorders in the Church of England may be expected.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling Burghs): I have nothing to add to the answer which I gave to my hon. friend the Member for the East Toxteth Division of Liverpool on May 28th.†

MR. FULLERTON: What is the cause of the delay? Cannot the right hon. Gentleman press for the report?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Government have no control over the Commission. I can only convey to the House what the expectations of the Commission are.

The Unemployed Bill.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he can now say when the promised Bill for amending the Unemployed Workmen Act will be introduced; and, in any case, whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce the Bill in such time as will permit of its passage into law before the adjournment of the House.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I answered this Question yesterday. I am afraid I can say nothing definite at present. I do not think it is at all likely that the Bill will be introduced in time for passage through all its stages before the summer adjournment.

MR. PICKERSGILL: Does not the right hon. Gentleman recognise the extreme importance of giving local authorities time to make suitable arrangements?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Yes, I am quite aware of that, but then our time is limited.

MR. KEIR HARDIE asked if the Bill on passing would become immediately operative.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: That will be considered.

Colonial Vote.

MR. A. E. W. MASON (Coventry): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the necessity of securing in South Africa wider opportunities for British settlers, he will grant an early day for the further discussion of the Colonial Vote.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: There are other grounds besides these mentioned by my hon. friend. We will do our best to find a day, though I fear it cannot be an early day.

*SIR J. DICKSON-POYNDER (Wiltshire, Chippenham): Cannot the right hon. Gentleman give us a more encouraging assurance that the Government will take action than we have received from the Under-Secretary?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: That hardly arises out of the Question on the Paper.

Scottish Estimates.

MR. SMEATON (Stirlingshire): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, seeing that there are thirteen Motions on the Paper challenging Votes in the Scottish Estimates, that not a single Vote has yet been passed, that only two and a half hours on Thursday, June 14th, were devoted to discussion on these estimates, and that there are several matters of importance to Scotland, which can only receive attention during the discussion on the Estimates, he will grant another day for Scottish business.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am well aware that Scotland has had a scanty allowance of time, but I am afraid I cannot extend the promise I gave the other day.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. EMMOTT (Oldham) in the Chair.]

*MR. PIKE PEASE (Darlington) moved to leave out the word "if" from the beginning of sub-section (1), with the object of subsequently moving other Amendments with a view to making the granting of facilities obligatory. The hon. Member suggested that they might have some statement from the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Education with regard to the question as to whether religious teaching in the schools would or would not be given during school hours. Anyone who had a full knowledge of the question knew very well that a large percentage of the children would not receive any religious instruction unless such instruction was given during school hours. One could imagine an English village school with the children inside, listening to those playing outside. He hoped and trusted in the interests of the children of the country, that the right hon. Gentleman would consider the possibility of making some statement upon the question that day, because it was of great importance in connection with the Amendment before them. Some time ago they had a division with regard to secular education, and he believed there were in one lobby sixty-two Members. That did not represent the feeling of the House and the country upon the question, but at the same time it showed that there was a deep feeling among the people in favour of religious education being given during school hours. If it was not obligatory for children to go to school to receive religious instruction there was no doubt at least one-third of them would receive no moral teaching in the schools at all. There was no Member of the House who could say that a mandate was given to the Liberal Party to do away with religious instruction during school hours, and he thought there were few hon. Members who would not prefer religious instruction in school hours. The President of the Board of Education had said that he intended the clause to be not a sham but a reality, and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had supported that view. It was desirable that they should have some definition in the Bill with regard to what "extended facilities," and "ordinary facilities" meant. The man in the street believed that every ordinary school would have these facilities, but members of the Committee knew that there was no foundation for such a statement. The local authority need not take over a school at all, and there was no provision for compelling local authorities to make the granting of facilities a condition of the arrangement. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to say whether this teaching would be given in school hours and that the clause would be made mandatory.

"In page 2, line 24, to leave out the word 'if.'"—(Mr. Pike Pease.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'if' stand part of the clause."

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N.) said the hon. Member had referred to Clause 6, which provided that "the parent of a child attending a public elementary school shall not be under any obligation to cause the child to attend at the schoolhouse, except during the times allotted in the time-table exclusively to secular instruction." The hon. Member desired to know whether the Government contemplated any alteration of the provisions of that clause. All he could say was that upon that point the Government were perfectly willing when they came to Clause 6 that the question should be fairly and fully considered in such a way as to secure, if possible, that the children should be required to attend. That was not a view that met with special favour in his mind, because he had always been of opinion that, if they wished to make the conscience clause really effective, they ought to make it easy for the child as well as for the parent to claim exemption. For that reason he favoured the clause in the form in which it now appeared. But there was a great deal of feeling the other way, and when the Committee came to that clause the fullest opportunity would be afforded for considering the question—it might be upon a Government Amendment, although as to that he had not yet come to any definite conclusion; but he thought that in all probability the Committee would have an opportunity of considering the question on a Government Amendment. At all events, the whole question would be open for consideration and there would be no attempt whatsoever to take the clause as it at present stood as representing the view of the Government upon this important point. With regard to the amendment proposed by the hon. Gentleman, he did not think the clause as it at present stood was in any way open to any other objection than that there was no obligation upon the local authority to take a school at all. That was the gap of which so much had been heard. That gap was always in the mind of the Government; they knew perfectly well it was there, and he thought it would be found that in his speeches he had not used language inconsistent with that statement. The Government always contemplated that there was no obligation whatever on the local authority to take over a school, but they always contemplated that the schools would be willing to come over, and that the authorities would be desirous to take them; and that, when that was done, these facilities should be made a compulsory condition of their being taken over. They did not intend that a local authority should refuse to take a school because if it did it would have to grant facilities. That was not the intention of the Government, nor was it the effect of the clause; but by either a new clause or a new sub-section he would make it perfectly plain that the local authority, if it did take over a school, must grant these facilities, and also, possibly, say how it was to proceed to take it over. He wanted to make it perfectly clear, however, that the Government could not, and did not, propose to take away from the local authority the responsibility of providing for its own school requirements, and that they could not make it compulsory on the local authority to take over a school simply because one was there. It would be ridiculous to impose on the local authority the obligation of making suitable provision if they did not leave them free to say what suitable provision was. Subject to these considerations he hoped a way had been found to bridge over the gap. The Amendment could not be accepted.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) said that the statement just made by the right hon. Gentleman was a most important one. But he wished to begin his remarks by thanking the right hon. Gentleman for the concession he had made, rather, as he gathered, against his own natural inclination, to the very strong feeling which undoubtedly existed both in and out of the House. He did not regard as so satisfactory the statement of the right hon. Gentleman on the difficult problem of how to ensure that there should be these religious facilities given in schools, if they left, as the Government now desired to leave, a discretion to the local authority. He was not sure that the statement now made by the right hon. Gentleman squared with, he would not say his previous speeches, but the impression which those speeches had left on the minds of the Committee. He certainly was under the impression that, when the right hon. Gentleman made the promise that he would, on the Report stage, bring forward an Amendment to bridge over the gap between Clause 1 and Clause 3, it carried with it an obligation on the local education authority to take over those schools which consisted of buildings fit for educational purposes. There was a common agreement on both sides of the Committee that it would be most unjust to compel the local authority to take over schools which were so seriously defective that, obviously, the proper course was to build a new school; but he thought the Government agreed with them in thinking that, subject to that exceptional qualification, there was to be an obligation on the local authority to take over voluntary schools. Now he understood the Government had withdrawn from that. [MINISTERIAL cries of "No."] He looked that morning at the imperfect report, as all reports of their proceedings in Committee were imperfect, in The Times of what the right hon. Gentleman said last night, and he certainly gathered, both from the speech which he had just made and from the words that fell from him last night, that he did not propose to require local authorities to take over schools in all cases, not even in those, necessarily, where the school was fit for educational purposes. He hoped that before they left this Amendment the right hon. Gentleman would clear up for ever certain ambiguities which seemed to attach to the utterances of the Government on the subject and the doubts which were very widely spread on both sides of the House. He did not think the Government had made it quite clear, so far as this gap was concerned, exactly what it was they meant to require the local authority to do. But there was another gap the true character and importance of which he did not think the right hon. Gentleman appreciated. Supposing the trustees of a school said they would rather not enter into any arrangements with the local authority, then, under Clause 8, the fate of that school was handed over to the Commission of Three, who had power to impose conditions of transfer upon the voluntary school, but not to impose conditions of reception or acquisition on the part of the local authority. That was a separate and quite distinct gap in the scheme of the Government, for this one-sided imposition of terms had no corresponding coercive effect on the other party to the transaction.

*THE CHAIRMAN said that he was afraid that the right hon. Gentleman was getting very wide of the question before the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to be opening up the whole question of the Bill and not the particular Amendment before the Committee.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he quite agreed with the Chairman's ruling. He only wanted to show that he thought the right hon. Gentleman had withdrawn from the pledges he had given to the Committee.

*THE CHAIRMAN said he wanted the right hon. Gentleman to confine his observations as far as possible to the facilities given under Clause 3.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he would confine his observations to the religious side of the question. There were two points in which the mandatory character of religious facilities was really not given by anything which the Government had promised either upon this or any other clause.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) said that the discussion had been from the start entirely out of order. The Amendment, so far as he could understand it—and it was not easy to grasp its bearing—was intended to make the granting of facilities for religious instruction mandatory in all cases where a school was taken over by the local authority. But if a school were taken over under Clause 2, on the terms of the trustees, the granting of facilities under Clause 3 was mandatory as the clause stood. Where the hon. Member seemed to have gone astray both in his Amendment and in his speech, was that he did not recognise that this was a matter which came back to Clause 2. The question of whether a school could be taken over had to be settled under Clause 2; but supposing the question was settled under that clause, then Clause 3 became mandatory. If, under Clause 2, the school was taken over, the Board must give the facilities. He was surprised that the subtle intellect of the noble Lord the Member for East Marylebone could not realise that point, but there was no doubt that the first gap was in Section 2. He quite agreed in the importance attached by the Leader of the Opposition to the terms of the Amendment of the Government which was to be put upon the Paper in regard to Clause 2, but he did not think that it would be orderly or profitable to discuss the question now. He hoped and had no doubt that that Amendment would be put upon the Paper in good time for them to consider and discuss it. The real point they were now discussing was whether this proposed Amendment increased the mandatory or the compulsory force of Clause 3. He could not see that it did, and he thought that hon. Members should address themselves to Clauses 6 and 8 in regard to this question, because even if the Amendment were carried, the clause would have no more effect than it had at present.

*MR. BUTCHER (Cambridge University) said he found himself unable to agree with the hon. Member for East Mayo. There were two "ifs" which stood between the owners and the acquisition of these special facilities. One was "if" the school had been transferred—they had nothing to say about that question now, because they had dealt with it under Clause 2—but there was another "if," namely, "if" the granting of these facilities had been made a condition of the transfer, either under an arrangement between the owners and the local authority under Clause 2 or under a scheme made by the Commission of Three under Clause 8. He ventured —although he was not a lawyer—to say that without the assent of the local authority these facilities could not be made a condition of the transfer. Hence, unless the Government accepted the proposed Amendment of his hon. friend the Member for Darlington, they had no assurance whatever that the facilities would ever become a condition of the transfer. The Minister for Education last night said that there were two gaps; the second gap which he discovered being that if the owners or trustees did not make facilities a condition of transfer there might very truly be a difficulty. The right hon. Gentleman observed that this was a somewhat small gap, for the Government assumed that they could safely rely upon owners and trustees to make the condition part of the bargain. But a further gap which the right hon. Gentleman did not notice was far more important and it was with this they were now concerned. The local authority might make it a condition of the transfer that these facilities should not be granted. That was what they had to guard against. In either case, whether under Clause 2 or Clause 8, the local authority had the final word in deciding the question. In one of his speeches last night, the Minister for Education had assumed that in every case where the transfer took place facilities would be given. He only appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to give effect to that assumption. They had not heard from Ministers what would happen if an authority objected to the facilities being given. Ministers had assumed that they would be given. Why not, therefore, say in the Bill that they should be given? It might be said that this would show an undue distrust of local authorities. He did not think so. They could not forget that there had been speeches made recently, only a few in the House but a good many outside, revealing a hardness and want of sympathy which inspired a certain distrust, he would not say of local authorities as a whole, but of certain individuals who, flushed with the pride of political victory, were prepared to drive hard bargains, even in regard to matters of conscience. He would appeal to the Minister for Education to allow this matter of facilities once and for all to be lifted above the region of wrangling and placed outside local politics. Moreover, what was meant by "facilities." It was all obscure and vague. Were they to be given during the time in which the local authority had the control of the school? He imagined that that was so, because otherwise the owners could get quite as much without claiming the facilities at all out of school hours. Again, was the Cowper-Temple instruction to be given concurrently with the special facilities and at the same hour? That is to say, were those who did not desire want the special facilities to get the Cowper-Temple instruction as an alternative. A third point was whether denominational teaching might be given every day of the week provided no child received it more than twice a week? The question of facilities had been solved elsewhere, although he had a certain hesitation in referring to the subject, because the Minister for Education had deprecated any allusion to the experience of other countries. The Secretary for India, however, not very long ago said that—

> "Serious persons must reflect that whilst we are wrangling over unnecessary issues, our German and other rivals are straining every nerve to have real education."

Well, what happened in Germany? In Germany there was a dual system; on the one hand there were a certain number of mixed schools containing children of different denominations. The parents of these children had not a conditional but an assured right to the religious instruction they desired being given in school hours and by competent teachers. But the mixed system was quite exceptional. The ordinary system, however, was that of strictly denominational schools, where children were educated in their own creed. This prevailed wherever there was an adequate number of children of one denomination and was almost universal. Some years ago Liberal feeling in Germany was rather against the denominational system, but experience had shown that the denominational were so superior to the mixed schools that he would mention opinion was now in favour of the denominational schools. The only other country was Ireland. He could not help being impressed with the marked contrast between the religious toleration in matters of education that obtained in Ireland and the singular intolerance that existed in England. Whatever might be the faults of Ireland in other ways, in her educational system she had managed to find a concordat. She, too, had a two-fold method answering to Clauses 3 and 4 of this Bill. In all the "vested" schools, which corresponded roughly to the "provided" schools in England, a right of entry was allowed. It was not a matter of bargaining; and the religious instruction so given was that which was approved of by the parents or guardians. The teachers who gave it might be either the school teacher or someone, cleric or layman, brought in from outside. And in Ireland precisely the same thing occurred as in Germany; the denominational schools vastly preponderated. The theory in Ireland was that of combined secular and separate religious instruction; but in practice the denominational system better satisfied the consciences of the people. There were 8,500 national schools in Ireland and only 1,829 of these were mixed schools. After all, "facilities" were only a second best expedient. That was the first lesson to be drawn from the experience of other countries. They were useful as a subsidiary arrangement to meet practical difficulties or to satisfy theoretical grievances, but they were not in themselves a security for a sound religious education. Secondly, the general intrusion of amateurs was dangerous to the discipline of schools. Thirdly, in so far as mixed schools were carried on with any success, it was by the employment of the school teachers in the school hours, and, moreover, by opening up the right to all denominations alike. His inference, therefore, was that Clause 3 was useful as an adjunct and supplement to Clause 4, but that Clause 4 ought to be largely and generously expanded.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Mr. Robson, South Shields) said the Amendment made a small but very important change in the clause. As the clause now stood the arrangement between the local authority and the trustees of voluntary schools was to be a voluntary arrangement. The Amendment proposed to put into that voluntary arrangement a compulsory term. That was not, in his opinion, the most convenient mode of conducting or concluding a voluntary negotiation. At present the trustees might or might not demand facilities for special privileges; the Amendment proposed that they should be compelled to do so. The short answer to the hon. Member was that the Amendment proposed to incorporate a compulsory term into a voluntary negotiation: that was not the most desirable way of conducting a voluntary negotiation, and they had no need to travel to foreign countries to discover that.

Mr. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.) said he desired to say one word upon the effect of Clause 3 as it would be if amended on the lines proposed by his hon. friend. The hon. Member for Cambridge University had said that he regarded Clause 3 as an important addition and complement to Clause 4, but really in the practical application of this Act Clauses 3 and 4 dealt with totally different classes of schools. Clause 3 was the one slight hope which was left to the rural schools of the country. Clause 4 could not apply in its present form to the rural schools. It was Clause 3 which would govern the rural school system. The hon. Member for East Mayo did not believe the Amendment was necessary, because the trustees under Clause 2 and subsequent clauses would have the power to make the granting of these facilities a compulsory part of the transfer. That, he thought, was not so. The Solicitor General had just said that this arrangement was to be voluntary, but the hon. and learned Gentleman did not even know his own Bill, because in Clause 2 the Government made the part relating to the transfer compulsory. When they were discussing Clause 2 they sought to add a sub-section to sub-section (a) making not only maintenance but the granting of facilities a compulsory result of the transfer. That Amendment was resisted successfully, hon. Gentlemen opposite point to Clause 3 as the means for securing the desirod result. It was therefore only to Clause 3 that they had to look for the provision of these religious facilities in the rural schools. His hon. friend had asked, and he hoped that the question would be answered, as it was very important that the Committee should be given an idea of the way in which these facilities were to be granted, because if they were not to be made mandatory it would be a cause of very great irritation and difficulty in the country districts. It was for that reason that the Opposition the other day pressed on the Government, with ultimate success, the contention that this House should accept, and not transfer to the local authority, the responsibility of deciding whether or not those religious facilities should be granted. He could well conceive a local education authority, moved, as they undoubtedly would be, by the arguments which had been frequently expressed in this House, being led in some cases to vary their action. But if this clause were made mandatory, and the Amendment of the Government took the form which they most certainly thought it would take and which the report of the debates of the time justified them in believing was then intended, namely, of imposing upon the local authority the obligation of granting these facilities provided the schools were fit and efficient for educational purposes, then the whole of the religious controversy would be removed from the local area. Otherwise the local authority would not be able to avoid discussing these controversial questions. If his hon. friend's Amendment were adopted, they would lay down what was to be the principle to guide the local authorities in future. That the granting of these facilities should be an obligatory part of the bargain was the least measure of justice that could be granted. He had hoped the Minister for Education would have told them something about the scheme of these facilities, as to which the Committee were in ignorance. No doubt the Government had some definite idea as to a scheme which, if the right hon. Gentle man would take them into his confidence, would help the Committee in discussing the clause. He hoped all those who believed that, in common justice, when a voluntary school was transferred it should be an obligation that religious facilities should be granted would not be led away by any doubt as to the meaning of Clause 2 or the effect of Clause 3 in its present form, but would see that the scheme could be carried out in no other way than by adopting the Amendment of his hon. friend, or something very much like it. This was the least measure of justice that could be given to those schools which had done such invaluable work for the children of the country, which work they were anxious to continue, only asking that they should be treated with fairness.

Mr. BIRRELL said they could not—as he thought the hon. Member for East Mayo quite accurately pointed out—consider any provisions that might be hereafter proposed for bridging over the gap of Clause 2. It could not be done on Clause 3. There was a gap, and it was the intention of the Government that there should be that gap. But he had promised to introduce, at the termination of the Committee stage on Clause 4, words which very possibly would alter the situation very much, because the four-fifths schools might be fully provided for by and under that clause, and the gap in that case filled up. It would then remain to consider the filling up of the gap generally; but it would be out of order to attempt to do it on this clause. The Government did not want to make it absolutely compulsory that, in the case of every school that was taken over under Clause 3, the granting of these denominational facilities should be made a condition, because it would be found in the case of a good many of those schools, when their trusts came to be examined, that they ought not to have a denominational character at all. The Amendment was quite unnecessary, unless it were considered rather in the way in which the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down construed it as making it obligatory upon the local authority——

Mr. WALTER LONG said that what he desired to make clear was that where the transfer of a voluntary school took place, the granting of religious facilities should be as obligatory as was the burden of expenditure which was made.

Mr. BIRRELL said this seemed to him to be a very narrow point. He quite agreed, and he had already said so, that it was certainly not intended that when a local authority wanted to take over a school they should make it a condition that, if the facilities in question were insisted on, they would not take over the school. That was not the intention of the clause, and he could not conceive that it was the effect of the clause as it stood. But he was perfectly ready to consider that question and to make it perfectly plain that if the local authority wanted to take the school, and if the trustees wanted to have facilities, then facilities there should be.

Lord R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) said there seemed to be some misapprehension on this point. The question was this: supposing there was a local education authority that did not want on conscientious grounds to grant special facilities under Clause 3, it could avoid the obligations which the right hon. Gentleman thought rested upon it by refusing to take over the school. They were discussing the point under some disadvantage, because they did not quite know what the right hon. Gentleman's clause was going to be. There were two ways in which the local education authority could avoid its obligation. They could refuse to take the school over on these grounds, and the matter might be argued before the Commission. They might succeed in persuading the Commission, but they were perfectly safe in any case, because the Commission could not put upon them anything unless they consented. The second way of avoiding their obligation was not to make it a condition of arrangements—that was to say, not a condition of the voluntary agreement. The Solicitor-General, differing entirely as he understood from the Minister for Education, regarded it as very desirable that it should be a matter of arrangement and discussion between the trustees and the local education authority. He did not understand that to be the view of the Minister for Education, and the only way to avoid the difficulty was to say that it should not be a matter of discussion between the two whether the facilities should be granted or not. It was an important point, and he understood the right hon. Gentleman admitted it.

Mr. BIRRELL said he would consult with the noble Lord as to the best words to carry it into effect.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said the remarks of the Minister for Education were very satisfactory, because there was certainly an impression left on his mind, and, he thought, upon other minds, that the statement the right hon. Gentleman made to-day was not in harmony with that which he made the other day. From the previous statement they clearly understood that one condition only was to be permitted to interfere with the necessity of taking over a voluntary school, but to-day he understood the right hon. Gentleman to give a much larger concession. Was there intended to be any difference between the two statements? If not, what was the nature of the loophole which would enable the local authorities to escape from making this arrangement?

*MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.) said it was obvious that a great deal of the discussion was wasted because they had not before them the exact terms of the Amendment to Clause 2 foreshadowed by his right hon. friend. But the Amendment now before the House raised a perfectly clear and intelligible issue, and he did make an appeal to his right hon. friend in the strongest terms. The right hon. Gentleman had already somewhat strained the allegiance of many of his strongest followers in the House of Commons by the Amendment which he had promised, placing as it would the discretion of the local education authority at the disposal of the Board of Education. He could assure his right hon. friend that many of his supporters who had sat silent on the Ministerial Benches with the view of helping the Bill forward, and they intended to do so to the utmost of their power, had listened to the foreshadowing of that Amendment with much doubt and misgiving. He hoped that in Clauses 3 and 4 his right hon. friend would show some firmness and some adherence to the general principles of the Bill, upon which he had obtained the power he now exercised as Minister for Education and upon which the Government had obtained their great majority. On the Ministerial side they were as anxious as hon. Members opposite to facilitate the advance of education by securing real peace in the schools on this religious question. He had not the slightest doubt that in dealing with village schools the local authorities would exercise generosity, discretion, and wisdom, but he warned the Minister for Education that he would strain to a dangerous point the allegiance of his followers if he consented to this whittling away of the discretionary power of the local education authorities in dealing with these vital issues under the Bill. The whole future of education was bound up in the discretionary power and rights of the local education authorities, and they regarded with the very gravest misgiving any tendency to yield to the very ingenious and able arguments advanced from the other side. Those arguments were based upon the one contention that the Party opposite desired to maintain on a permanent footing and with the sanction of the law the denominational system in this country. What they wished was to treat the present denominational schools and their teaching with as much generosity and forbearance as possible. It was for that reason that he welcomed this clause as a fair solution, just as much as he was determined to vote against Clause 4 in whatever form it finally assumed.

LORD BALCARRES reminded the Committee that the President of the Board of Education had already given them a promise that in cases of properly equipped sanitary schools the local education authority would have to grant facilities if demanded.

MR. BIRRELL: But the point my hon. friend was referring to is in regard to bridging the gap.

LORD BALCARRES said that if there was anything in the statement of the President of the Board of Education that he proposed to fill up the gap which existed in Clause 3 by making Clause 4 mandatory then the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire might have something to say on Monday next. The value of those facilities was largely governed by Clause 6. There was no provision in Clause 3 as regards school hours. The Minister for Education had told them that Clause 6 was going to be amended——

THE CHAIRMAN: Will the noble Lord kindly confine himself to the Amendment.

LORD BALCARRES said he wished to discuss the question of facilities, and they depended upon what was going to be done in Clause 6. In the event of Clause 6 being amended, he wished to know if this special denominational instruction would actually be given out of the hours of compulsory school attendance. This was a point to which they attached very great importance.

THE CHAIRMAN: That does not arise at this stage.

MR. SAMUEL ROBERTS (Sheffield, Ecclesall) desired to thank the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Education for his very satisfactory assurances as to what he would do when they reached Clause 6. Two points had troubled the owners of voluntary schools; one was that the children should be allowed to go free during the hour for religious instruction, and the second was as to the teachers having the option of giving religious instruction. With regard to the Amendment, what they wanted was that if the owners and trustees of voluntary schools required these facilities under Clause 3 they must be given. If that was made clear by the Amendment, Members on that side would be satisfied.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorganshire, Mid.) said that if they went much farther in the direction in which the Minister for Education had gone, they would find the Bill being voted for consistently by Members of the Opposition and voted against by those sitting on the Ministerial side. The Amendment made the clause read absolutely absurd. He understood that the Minister for Education was going to lead his supporters into the Lobby against the Amendment. He was in favour of the clause as it stood at present. They had got into a great many of these muddles by discussing other clauses and promised Amendments which were not before the Committee, but the essence of this clause, and indeed the essential principle of the whole Bill, was that the local education authority should not be compelled to do certain things, and that it should be in their discretion to do certain things. The essence of the clause was that the local authority should be able to enter into an arrangement with the owners of voluntary schools, and if they did, then they were to have power to grant these facilities. The meaning of the clause was perfectly clear. The object of the Amendment was to place compulsion upon the local education authority. He voted for the Second Reading upon the basis that these were to be matters of arrangement between the local education authority and the owners of denominational schools. Upon those grounds he should vote against the Amendment. If there was any more compulsion put upon the education authority he should certainly be compelled to abstain if he did not vote against the Government. This was all to be a matter of arrangement, and it was absurd to hold out these hopes to the other side.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend) said the discussion had shown that the Opposition were justified in the arguments they had put forward in regard to this clause. They assumed that the Minister for Education was quite sincere in granting facilities to religious denominations in connection with voluntary schools, and they assumed that the facilities would be real and not illusory. If the children were not compelled to attend, and if the teachers were not obliged to teach them, the intentions of the Government would be nullified by the operation of Clauses 6 and 7. They were appealing to the Government that Clause 3 should be so amended as to make it certain that the declared intention of the Government would be carried out. Members of the Opposition assumed that the intention of the Government would not be carried out by the clause in its present form. He thought they all clearly understood that if a local authority desired to take over a school, and the trustees desired to hand it over, facilities should be compulsory—that was to say that the local education authority should give the facilities.

MR. BIRRELL: If they are asked for.

SIR GILBERT PARKER said that as this was now understood, the discussion had produced great good. If there was any confusion in the minds of hon. Members opposite regarding the clause the Minister for Education had taken the opportunity of clearing up that misunderstanding. In the minds of hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House, there had been a complete lack of understanding on the matter until it was cleared up. They expressed their deep satisfaction that they had secured what they wished for, and what the Government intended to grant. The voluntary schools had been in a sense the property of those who founded them, who gave most of the money for them, and who through many years under trying conditions supported out of their own pockets, with very little help from the State, the education which was for the good not only of Church of England children, but of Nonconformist children, and the children of the poor who had no faith at all.

MR. HARWOOD (Bolton) said the remarks of the hon. members for East Northamptonshire and Mid-Glamorganshire were quite uncalled for. As he understood the matter the Minister for Education had done no more than give assurances which would make quite sure what everyone understood to be his intention. He did not think there was a single person in the House who heard the speech of the Minister for Education who did not understand it to be his intention that, provided the local authorities thought it desirable to take over the schools, and provided the owners of the schools desired to have these facilities, it should not be within the power of the local authorities to refuse them. He must protest against the Government being threatened in this childish and tragic way.

MR. HERBERT (Buckinghamshire, Wycombe) said he understood that the position desired to be met by the Amendment was this. There was, let them suppose, a voluntary school which, from a sanitary point of view, was suitable, and which from the point of view of educational necessity and economy the local authority would be willing to take over; but the local authority said to the trustees that they did not mean to have any denominational instruction given in the school, and, therefore, the trustees made it a condition that they would not hand it over unless the local authority gave them the right to facilities for denominational instruction under Clause 3. He understood that such a case would be clearly covered by the undertaking given by the Minister for Education. He did not quite agree with the interpretation which the Leader of the Opposition had been putting on the words of the Minister for Education. The right hon. Gentleman stated distinctly what hon. Members on his side of the House understood to be his intention. The Leader of the Opposition put it this way—

> "If you grant that a voluntary school is structurally fit, then the local education authority must take it over."

He said No.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If desired by the trustees.

MR. HERBERT said that if there was a large provided school built with the view of meeting the future needs of the neighbourhood, surely it could not be right from the point of view of the public interest that the trustees of a non-provided school should be able to say, "You must take it over, although from the point of view of the educational interest, you do not require it." That was the sense in which the Minister for Education was understood on that side of the House. The right hon. Gentleman had clearly given an undertaking that a school should not be refused simply because it was a denominational school. If the owners of a voluntary school made it a condition of handing it over that facilities should be provided, it would not then be open to the local authority to say that they would not comply with that condition.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said the speech of the hon. Member for the Wycombe Division brought out exactly the point on which there was still some slight doubt in the minds of those who heard the debate the other day, and who listened to the statement of the Minister for Education. He certainly thought that the right hon. Gentleman went further than the hon. Member. A local authority might find that they had accommodation at their disposal in which all the children in a district could be received. There was, however, a denominational school in the district which, let them say, was a perfectly fit structure. According to his view of the Government pledge, the needs of denominational education would be safeguarded by making it compulsory for the local education authority to take over that second school; but according to the view of the hon. Member for the Wycombe division, the Government had entered into no such undertaking. It was evident that there was really a material difference between these two versions as to what the Government intended. The hon. Member had clearly put forward his conception of the pledge. He hoped he had not less clearly put forward his view of it. He hoped the matter would be cleared up by the Minister of Education.

Mr. DILLON asked whether it was or was not open to the Committee now to discuss the terms of the pledge given by the Government in regard to Clause 2.

The CHAIRMAN: It is not open to the Committee to discuss that subject.

Lord MORPETH (Birmingham, S.) said that under the present Act the difficulty alluded to by an hon. Member had already arisen in one of the divisions of Buckinghamshire. He had in his mind the case of a small village with two schools—one British and one Church of England. It was obvious that from the educational point of view it was a bad method of educating the children.

The CHAIRMAN: That is the same question again. It is really not in order, because the matter does not come under the terms of this Amendment.

Mr. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool) said the Minister for Education had stated that the granting of facilities should be optional. He reminded the Committee that the right hon. Gentleman in his speech on the First Reading of the Bill, when referring to Clauses 2 and 3, said that the facilities were to be of a compulsory character.

Mr. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) said he objected to the Amendment because it took away from the local authority the power to manage their schemes. The Bill as it stood referred to the arrangements made at the taking over of the schools. If the Amendment were adopted it would be in the power of the owners or trustees of the school to call upon the local authority at some future time to make a different arrangement from that agreed upon at the taking over of the schools. He hoped the Minister for Education would stick to the Bill, and that while he tried to conciliate members opposite he would not disregard a large body of feeling on his own side of the House.

*__Mr. LEIF JONES__ (Westmoreland, Appleby) said that the point raised by the Amendment was not of such importance as was represented. It was thought that pressure might be put by the local authority on the trustees to waive the condition they had the power to make as to facilities for religious teaching, and that it might be conveyed to them somehow or other that if they insisted on that condition the school might not be taken over. Therefore it was proposed to make the condition mandatory. He submitted that the Bill dealt with the matter in a better way than the Amendment. If they wanted the school, the local authority had the power to go to the Commissioners under Clause 8. There might be circumstances in which it would be well to allow the trustees to waive the conditions and hand over the school. There might be circumstances in which the local authority would hold it to be undesirable to continue a school as a denominational school. For instance, in a village in which nine-tenths of the population were Nonconformists, it might be better to make provision for the denominational teaching of a tenth of the children outside the schools rather than build a new school. He could not conceive that the law would ever compel a local authority to take over a denominational school in a case of that kind. Without addressing any minatory language to the Minister for Education he ventured to suggest that his own scheme of a Commission to consider on what terms a trust school was to be taken over was a better method than that proposed in the Amendment.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Education would clear up the point at issue.

MR. BIRRELL said that he had undertaken to bring in an Amendment in the best words that could be found as soon as they had disposed of Clause 4. He could not go into the matter now without a much longer statement than he was inclined to make at that moment. The only undertaking which he had given was in reply to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Oxford University, as to making it obligatory on the part of the local authorities to take over the voluntary schools. He did then admit that it was impossible for the Government to consider a one-sided obligation of that sort, without a corresponding obligation on the part of all owners of voluntary schools to hand over their schools to the local authorities if the local authorities wished it. It was, therefore, a double-barrelled obligation. That was all the promise he had made; and he was not bound by any promise or kind of obligation other than that. Then he went on to say that, if it could be arranged without destroying the educational responsibility of the local authorities, he was anxious to secure that no local authority should refuse to take over the proper voluntary school simply and solely because of the religious facilities and obligations which would be attached to it under Clauses 3 and 4. That was all that was in his mind. After Clause 4 was disposed of, the Government would introduce such words as might be necessary for that purpose.

MR. PIKE PEASE said he wished to withdraw his Amendment, which had called forth two statements of the greatest importance from the Minister for Education, viz., in regard to religious education being given in school hours and also in regard to making that power mandatory.

Leave to withdraw Amendment being refused—

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir Alexander Acland-Hood and Viscount Valentia.

*MR. MASSIE (Wiltshire, Cricklade) objected to the expression "of some special character," as describing the religious instruction to be given under the facilities provided by this clause and Clause 4, and moved to delete it and insert "in accordance with the provisions of the trust deed." He wished to know whether some limit could not be put upon the variety of the religious instruction. It was important that the character of this religious instruction should be specified as definitely as possible, as leave to give i would be part of the lease; and it seemed bette to define it according to the trust deeds than leave it to be wrangled about or to be interpreted by the Courts. These deeds usually described the instruction in a simple and definite form, such as "in accordance with the teaching of the Church of England" or the "doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church." The only reason for these facilities was respect for the trust deeds, and this object might be frustrated by the ambiguity of the phrase, since the parents of four-fifths of the children might capture particular schools for an alien faith. These were the reasons for which he asked the Government to give the Committee a more exact definition of "religious instruction of a special character," and that was the main purpose of his Amendment.

"In page 2, line 25, to leave out the words 'of some special character,' and insert the words 'in accordance with the provisions of the trust deed.'"—(Mr. Massie.)

Mr. LOUGH said the object of this Amendment was to obtain some clear explanation of the words "some special character." It was suggested that they might possibly get something somewhat clearer than the words in the Bill. But they had had an illustration of the difficulty of doing that in the speech of the hon. Member who moved the Amendment. The hon. Gentleman suggested the words "in accordance with the provisions of the trust deeds," but in a great many cases there were no trust deeds at all. The hon. Member did not tell the Committee the way out of the difficulty. Then again in many cases the trust-deed did not define clearly what the nature of the religious instruction was to be, and they would in those cases have to trace from other sources the growth of the religious teaching that existed. That was a great difficulty of which the suggestion in the Amendment would not get rid. Another difficulty was the change of the tone of the religious teaching in this country. He submitted that all these difficulties were exceedingly well met by the happy expression which the Government had incorporated in the Bill, and he did not see his way to accept the Amendment.

*__Mr. AUSTIN TAYLOR__ (Liverpool, East Toxteth) did not consider that the explanation of his hon. friend had altogether disposed of the difficulty. In the Act of 1902 the question of trust deeds came up, and a special provision was inserted by the House of Lords with regard to them. In the Act of 1902 the bishops or other ecclesiastical authorities were given as the court of appeal to decide whether the religious instruction given in a school was or was not in accordance with the provisions of the trust deed. When that Act was in Committee he moved an Amendment that the court of appeal should be the Privy Council, but it was rejected. Under this Bill provision was going to be made for religious instruction of a special character. That was all they knew about it; trust deeds were not mentioned; no particular religion was named; they did not even know the hemisphere from which the religion was to be drawn. It was upon that that he asked, Was there to be any appeal in case of dissatisfaction on the part of the parents of the children who attended the school? Who was going to decide after the bargain was made? Supposing that in a particular school special facilities for evangelical teaching were given, and the people woke up to the fact that a Roman Catholic in the guise of a Churchman had taken the place of the Evangelical clergyman, was there to be any court of appeal to decide whether the provisions of the special facilities had been complied with, and as to whether the children were getting the facilities which the local authority bargained they should get? It ought not to be left in doubt, especially owing to the very serious changes which were taking place in the Church. He wanted to know from his hon. friend, not whether he was prepared to alter the wording of this particular clause, but whether they were to have any further appeal in case dissatisfaction arose from the fact that the religious instruction given was not what the local authority expected when it made the bargain, and was not in accordance with the provisions of the trust deed.

Mr. LOUGH was understood to say that he thought the provision was perfectly clear.

Lord R. CECIL said the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Education had not met the point of the hon. Member for the East Toxteth Division. What was the meaning of the words "of some special character?" He did not know; he saw nothing in the clause to explain what they meant. Apparently they meant the special character of the religion provided for in the trust deeds. If they did not mean that he did not know what they did mean. They might mean nothing so far as he could see. This was an admirable illustration of the extraordinary ambiguity of the clause. He thought the Government ought to explain what they meant by the words "of some special character." It might be that the Government contemplated some elaborate system of reference first to the trust deed and subsequently to the bishop or to the Board of Education. He did not know. Or it might mean of the special character selected by the trust deed.

Dr. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.) agreed that the words were somewhat vague, but thought the proposed Amendment would land them in greater ambiguity. He suggested as a practical way out of the difficulty that the decision of the clauses should be of a negative character, and that "not repugnant to the provisions of any of the trust deeds relating thereto" should be inserted after "character." He thought that would get out of the difficulty.

Sir E. CARSON (Dublin University) said a good deal of this difficulty had arisen because the Government had quite unnecessarily broken the trusts. It would have been sufficient for the purposes of their Bill if they had still maintained the trusts except so far as was necessary for the purposes of carrying out the Bill. But in spite of the protests that had been made they let the trusts go, so that the owners of the schools now had a free hand and were at liberty to set up a religion which might not be in accordance with the trust deed at all. He would urge something in accordance with what the hon. Member for North Camberwell had suggested. Some alteration might be made after the words "of some special character." He did not think the explanation of the Parliamentary Secretary was sufficient, because they might have to deal with schools where trust deeds existed. If some such words as suggested were put in after "character" they would meet the case of trust deeds, and also the cases in which there were no trust deeds but in which it would be easy to prove there had been. It was absolutely necessary that there should be some limiting words in the clause; otherwise it would give absolute discretion to an owner to set up any religion he wished even though it were contrary to the provisions of the trust deed.

Sir W. ROBSON (who was indistinctly heard) did not think there would be any difficulty in actual working. If they proceeded, however, to make reference to the trust deeds they would lose all the advantages in one direction which they gained in another, and he thought it would be far better to allow some latitude to the trustees than always to confine them to the terms of the trust. The Kenyon-Slaney clause in the Act of 1902 modified the terms of the trusts, and he did not think the present proposal gave more than a fair latitude to the trustees, who might be trusted to deal with these matters.

*Mr. MASSIE asked leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Sir E. CARSON moved an Amendment to add after "character" the words "in accordance with the trust, if any, on which the school has been previously held, and." He thought everybody, whatever might be his views as regarded religious instruction, would agree that if they were to afford such instruction it ought to be in accordance with the trust deed, and they ought not to leave the power to the trustee of parting with the trusts.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 25, after the word 'character' insert the words 'in accordance with the trust, if any, on which the school has been previously held, and.'"—(Sir E. Carson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. LAURENCE HARDY (Kent, Ashford) was afraid the words proposed might have a prejudicial effect upon those schools in the hands of private owners which could not be said to be held under any trust. In the Returns with regard to Kent there were something like fifty schools of which the larger number were distinctly under no trust at all, and if these words were introduced in the form in which they were moved he was rather afraid it might be held afterwards that these owners had no right to any special facilities at all. He only wished to make it quite clear that no voluntary school was excluded by the words his right hon. and learned friend wished to introduce.

*MR. PERKS (Lincolnshire, Louth) trusted the Government would not accept the Amendment. There were many conditions in which it might be necessary to have a special form of religious instruction which might be absolutely at variance with the trust deeds. Let them take, for example, the case of the Wesleyan schools. The conditions of the Wesleyan trust deeds provided for the teaching of the Wesleyan Catechism. There might possibly be nothing in the Wesleyan Catechism at variance with the fundamental tenets of the Church of England, but at the same time the Wesleyan authorities would probably desire to transfer many and perhaps all their schools without any condition whatever as to the teaching of the Catechism. Or let them take the case of the trust deed of the National Society, in regard to so many of the schools in Lincolnshire, where in many cases 60 per cent., in some cases more than 90 per cent., and in one case he knew of 98 per cent., of the children in national schools were Nonconformists. It would be absurd to impose a condition for ever on such buildings that all the children of the village were to be educated according to the condition of the National Society trust deeds in the tenets of the Church of England. This Amendment would require that. [OPPOSITION cries of "No."] It was dangerously near it, at all events. It was really essential in many of our villages that there should be the greatest possible latitude exercised in view of the rapid changes which were taking place in the instruction and even ceremonial in connection with religious worship, so that he begged the Government not to limit the local education authority by restricting this special form of religious teaching to a strict compliance with the conditions of the trust deeds on which the schools might be held.

MR. AUSTIN TAYLOR did not in any way desire to commit himself to an unqualified support of trust deeds, but he would respectfully ask for an Answer to a Question he put on a previous Amendment. He was not concerned so much about the bargain made between the local authority and the owners or trustees as to the special religious instruction, whatever it might be, as he was about the carrying out of the bargain. Under the Act of 1902 power of appeal was given to ecclesiastical authority to settle any deviation. What he desired to know was whether the local education authority had any interest in the question at all. If it had he could quite understand that the local education authority might object and the children attending school might object to the progressive development of a particular religious instruction under these facilities. If differences did arise in a school was there any appeal, and, if so, to whom did it lie? If there were no appeal, were they to understand there was unlimited discretion to the trustees as there appeared to be unlimited vagueness?

SIR W. ROBSON thought the matter would be met by the concluding words of the section which referred to the wishes of the parents. This clause was a sort of guarantee against the imposition on the school of extreme developments, about which his hon. friend was so apprehensive. There was no clause expressly enabling the local authority to control religious instruction. If there were such a clause they would be embarking in a sphere they did not desire to touch

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR thought the Question asked by the hon. Gentleman below the gangway was one of importance. Under the existing system it rested with the school managers of the voluntary schools to determine from year to year, or from week to week, what the religious instruction was to be. Who was going to be responsible for the denominational religious instruction when this Bill was passed? Who was going to be responsible for the management of religious education under the special facilities of this clause? At present there were managers and an appeal, but if this Bill were passed they would have neither managers nor an appeal. The point raised by the hon. Member was a very important one. A bargain was made between the trustees and the local authority after which the trustees had no further duties. [An Hon. Member: Why?] Were they still to manage? [An Hon. Member: They have to pay for it.] After all, paying was the least of the privileges they had. He was not so sure that the point could be adequately dealt with on the present Amendment, but it was certainly a matter which ought to be dealt with. He wished to know from the Government what authority in their opinion would be responsible from year to year for the character of the teaching which was to go on in the school. Was that laid down in the Bill, and if not upon whom would it devolve? He thought some clear provision ought to be made for this.

The CHAIRMAN: That question is really out of order. I am sorry to have to say so again. There is an Amendment before the Committee to insert certain words, and the question which the right hon. Gentleman is discussing does not arise on that Amendment.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said the Amendment was to insert words securing that the religious teaching should be—

"in accordance with the provisions of the trust deed."

That surely directly raised the question of who was responsible under the Bill for dealing with religion education in the schools. He should like to know whether that was not immediately and directly raised by this Amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: That question does not arise, as the right hon. Gentleman will see if he looks at the clause, which says that if facilities are part of the arrangement, facilities are to be allowed, and the right hon. Gentleman himself has practically said so himself.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: No.

The CHAIRMAN: I must rule that the question is not in order.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said all he desired to say was that he had not made the observation which the Chairman had attributed to him.

Lord R. CECIL said the discussion simply showed how ill-conceived the whole of this clause really was. The hon. Member for East Toxteth had pointed out that the children attending these schools had been accustomed to have a right to a certain class of religious teaching, and under this Bill there was no provision to secure that teaching. The clause proceeded upon the assumption that there would be only one kind of religion taught by special facilities under Clause 3, but that was a total misconception. It was quite possible to proceed on the lines that the education of the country already went on, namely, that schools established by private benefactions each offered a particular kind of religious instruction. There was a very great difficulty where there was only one such school in a particular district and where no choice of religious instruction was offered. The real reform required was to offer a choice of religious instruction to the children of each particular district, and they wanted facilities all round.

The CHAIRMAN: This question of all round facilities is not in order.

Lord R. CECIL said there was only one way in which a satisfactory agreement upon this subject could be reached, and that was by a full, fair and free discussion. It did not appear to him that the Government had in any way dealt with the objection raised by the hon. Member for East Toxteth, and they had not shown how the religious education of the children was to be protected. There was nothing to show that the trustees would have a word to say on the subject after they had made their arrangements. There was nothing at all to show what special facilities meant. The Bill provided that only one form of denominational teaching should be given, and that was of a wholly indefinite character.

Mr. J. W. WILSON (Worcestershire, N.) denied that this clause abrogated the trust deed. The trustees would continue to receive certain moneys, they would have the religious education in their own hands, and they would be responsible to the same authorities as before. There was nothing in the Bill to alter their position. They would still remain responsible for their trusts, and he thought all the discussion on this Amendment had been a waste of time.

Mr. STUART WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam) said it could not be left out of consideration that the managers would be abolished by the Bill, and the clause simply allowed the local authority to provide special facilities, and failed to construct an alternative authority to supervise the religious teaching.

Sir E. CARSON reminded the hon. Member for North Worcestershire that the trustees were left absolutely at large and under Section 2 the trust was entirely broken. The hon. Member had said that the position was the same under the Act of 1902, but it was not so, because the trusts for religion were preserved under that Bill. Under the present Bill such trusts were absolutely abrogated. Under Sub-section 2 of Section 2 the trustees had full power, notwithstanding the trusts, to make and carry out any arrangement under the section. He had asked to have that limited, but it was refused because the Government wanted to get rid of the trust deeds altogether. The trustees might under the Bill divert the school premises and the school trust to an entirely different purpose. That was the plain issue between them. All he asked was to have the religious teaching of a special character maintained as before, but there was not one word in the Bill to secure that. They really had come to an extremely important point, because, so far as he could see, once the trustees had made an arrangement with the local authority the trust was practically at an end as far as the trust deed was concerned. In his opinion, and he stated it most emphatically, if the Bill was left in its present form the whole of the special facilities would really be an absolute sham, because there was no machinery for seeing that the particular religious teaching which had been carried on should be continued. There was no machinery insisting on such special facilities being in accordance with the trust deed and unless some such machinery was set up by the Bill these provisions would in his opinion in many cases turn out to be absolutely illusory. Would the local authority have anything to say after the agreement was made in regard to the special religion which was being carried out in the school ?

Sir W. ROBSON said that if they had made their arrangement there was no doubt that the responsibility would be cast upon the owners or the trustees. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the owners and trustees would die and nobody would be left to perform their duties. He might inform the right hon. Gentleman that in the Bill they had contemplated the continuity of the Church of England. He assumed that the Church of England was not in the least likely to allow those schools to lapse from want of care and vigilance in the enforcement of the original trusts so far as the owners of the schools desired to enforce them. If the owners ceased to take further interest in the matter that was a different affair. Of course the Committee would not expect the Government to introduce a number of clauses providing machinery for cases where there were negligent or careless owners who did not desire to continue religious instruction. He thought everyone would assume the continuity of the Church of England, and the continuity of a desire on the part of those who belonged to it to safeguard their educational interests. They might feel confident that the interests of religious education would not be overlooked by them.

Mr. WYNDHAM said the hon. and learned Gentleman had not taken note of the fact that in the schedule of the Bill Sub-section (2) of Section 6 of the Act of 1902 was repealed, and that the Government left no machinery for carrying out all those matters which they professed to be leaving in the charge of the trustees of the schools.

Mr. CAVE (Surrey, Kingston) asked whether the Solicitor-General suggested that the Church of England or the parents of the children could take action in a case where a local authority broke, or neglected to carry out, an agreement to give facilities for Church of England teaching.

*__The CHAIRMAN__: If hon. Members will only look at the clause and the Amendment they will see that the words are—

> "If the affording of facilities under this section for the giving of religious instruction of some special character not permitted under Section 14 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, and in accordance with the provisions of the trust deed has been made a condition of any arrangement for the use by the local education authority of the schoolhouse of a transferred voluntary school."

If that is made a condition of the bargain, provision is made at the end of the clause that these facilities are to be allowed. Therefore the question which the hon. Gentleman asks does not arise.

Mr. HARWOOD said the Solicitor-General seemed to assume that trustees would be abrogated They would not be abrogated at all. This Bill only proposed to take the use of the transferred schools which must remain in the possession of the present owners The trustees must be continued, and one of their duties was to see to religious education. They would make a bargain and it would be for them to see that its terms were carried out. Therefore, the whole question raised by the Amendment was a mare's nest.

Question put.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Whiteley and Mr. J. A. Pease.

LORD R. CECIL moved to amend the clause so as to provide that where "the parents of fifteen children attending any transferred voluntary school desire such facilities," those facilities should be given.

*MR. LEIF JONES said that on Clause 2 the Committee had decided that owners of voluntary schools might make any arrangement they chose, and he did not see how, in the terms of the Amendment, the parents of fifteen children in a village or town could be allowed to over-ride a decision taken under Clause 2.

*THE CHAIRMAN said that the words quoted, if pushed, as the hon. Member suggested, to their extreme logical meaning, would have ruled out most of Clause 2 and the whole of Clause 3. He had tried to the best of his ability to deal with Amendments, and he did not feel justified in refusing the noble Lord the right to move his Amendment as amended.

LORD R. CECIL said that his Amendment raised a very important point which ought to be discussed. He could not help thinking that on this clause, as at present settled, they were proceeding on a principle which was only partially defensible. They were not proceeding on the principle that the schools, for most educational purposes, were to be taken out of the hands of the owners and handed over to the local education authority, and at the same time the owners were to settle what kind of religious instruction was to be given under Clause 3. He admitted that the Minister for Education had said that the local authority could not refuse to take over a school merely on the ground that an arrangement was demanded. Once having done that it seemed to him difficult to decide what religious instruction was to be given to the children attending the schools. The view he had always had was that such a settlement would take it out of the hands of the owners of the Church schools to decide what facilities should be given in the Church schools for religious teaching. That was, in his opinion, a very important concession to the Nonconformists. His Amendment proposed that wherever they found the parents of fifteen children—whether they were Wesleyans or Congregationalists or Anglicans—they should have facilities for these children to be taught according to the religion of their parents. That seemed to him to be perfectly just. He advocated that on all religious questions the children should be brought up in the faith of their fathers. He did not wish that any special religion should be taught, and it was for that reason that he advocated this improvement in the Bill. In the history of the education question we had drifted into a position that was not defensible. Up to 1870 the theory of our education policy was that the benefactor came in and established schools which the children could attend or not as they pleased. The benefit was entirely conferred on the children. But when education was made compulsory different considerations arose. Hardship occurred where there was only one school and that of a particular denomination. The only alternative was that the parents should have the right to say what religion should be taught to their children. He had sufficient confidence in the common-sense of his fellow-countrymen to believe that they would realise that that was the only really just settlement of the religious difficulty.

"In page 2, line 31, after the word 'schoolhouse,' to insert the words 'or if the parents of fifteen children attending a transferred voluntary school desire such facilities.'"—(Lord R. Cecil.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. MASTERMAN (West Ham, N.) said he was very glad that they had come to a discussion on this important point on Clause 3. He had given a pledge to his constituents to try and raise the point, but he had almost despaired of seeing it brought forward until the noble Lord moved his Amendment. It was a question that was raised in 1902 by the noble Lord's brother, but was not received with very much approbation on his side of the House. It would delight some of those who thought this was a fair and just system if the noble Lord could carry his Party with him under altered conditions. The Amendment did not, of course, mean that it was possible in the great majority of village schools to provide teaching of all kinds and sorts which the parents desired and divide the children into seven or eight pens, but it did provide some guarantee against the kind of injustice which, he thought, existed at present and which might be made permanent by this Bill. The injustice to which he referred was that only the clergyman should be admitted to give religious teaching, while the Nonconformist minister was excluded. That seemed to him to be a monstrous proposal to come from the Liberal side of the House. He thought it desirable that some Amendment of this sort should be carried, giving the right of entry to ministers of all denominations. During the First Reading of the Bill the plea was advanced that it was grossly unfair to contrive a system by which one privileged religion should have practically a monopoly of what religious teaching was given. They could not make the local authority establish pens or divisions, or enable every group of fifteen parents to do it. But they could give a chance for other kinds of denominational teaching besides the kind favoured by the owners of the transferred school. If there was only one kind of denominational teaching in a school, he had no doubt that all the children would gradually drift into the particular kind of religion which the instruction imparted, and they would get that predominance of one religion in the villages, which he should profoundly deplore. Personally, he might prefer that no religious teaching should be given in the schools, but if any denominational teaching was given, then they should have all denominational teaching, and get back from the principle of property to a broader and more general principle. He did not care anything at all about the property argument, but he did care that parents who seriously desired their children brought up in their own faith should have their desire gratified, and it was the duty of a Liberal Government to se that means were provided.

Mr. LOUGH thought that, whatever might be the merits of the question, to raise it on Clause 3 was extremely inconvenient. The clause related entirely to the arrangement to be made between the owners of voluntary schools and the local authorities. The proper occasion for the moving of such an Amendment would be on Clause 4. But the objection to the Amendment was that it would set up pan-denominationalism of the worst kind. It also involved the repeal of the Cowper-Temple clause of the Act of 1870. The question, moreover, had been three times before the Committee, and each time decided in the negative. The clause dealt with an entirely different subject from the Amendment, and the parents' right of appeal under Clause 4.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said that Clause 4 did not touch this question.

Mr. LOUGH said that Clause 4 did touch this question, because it conferred rights upon the parents of at least four-fifths of the children attending the school in regard to the acquisition of facilities. Clause 4 therefore would raise the general question of facilities to be given to parents, but under this clause they were confined to a great extent, if not absolutely, to the arrangements to be made with the owners or trustees of the schools. This point, therefore, ought to be raised upon Clause 4, although he quite recognised the scruples which had induced the noble Lord to endeavour to introduce his Amendment at this particular place.

Lord R. CECIL said he had no scruples at all. The only point was that he was a little surprised that the hon. Member, who was a Nonconformist, did not desire to have this question discussed.

Mr. LOUGH said that he would say no more, except that this Amendment in his judgment ought to be brought in somewhere else. He therefore hoped the noble Lord would not press the Amendment at this particular point.

*Sir WILLIAM ANSON said it was perfectly possible, and not inconvenient, to insert the Amendment in the Clause, though it would have been more convenient to have accepted the Amendment he had moved to Clause 1, which covered the same ground as this. Why should the nature of the religious instruction to be given in a school be confined to two alternatives — Cowper-Templeism or the particular form of denominationalism which commended itself to the owners? It was not the inclinations of the owners or trustees for which they should have regard, but the wishes of the parents of the children attending the school. As for the suggestion of the Parliamentary Secretary that the Amendment would set up pan-denominationalism, he would point out that there was not so great a variety of religious opinion in rural districts. It was to these districts that Clause 3 particularly referred, while Clause 4 related to urban districts. Nor did the Amendment involve the repeal of the Cowper-Temple clause, for it was only concerned with transferred voluntary schools and the facilities proposed to be allowed in them. He thought the Amendment would go a long way to settle the religious difficulty.

*MR. VERNEY (Buckinghamshire, N.) did not believe the noble Lord really desired that the Amendment in the way it was put down should be carried. The parents of fifteen children would include the case of three prolific widows with families of five children each attending the school. The Amendment as now worded with the numbers given would be impossible to work practically and would lead to uncertainty and confusion.

LORD R. CECIL said perhaps he might be allowed to explain. His interest was in the children, and he did not care whether they were born of prolific widows or not. He attached no great importance to the particular number fifteen, and was prepared to consider any Amendment which might be moved to alter that figure. What he did care about was that the children should be taught the religion of their parents.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY supported the Amendment, and said that this was the only clause upon which the matter could be raised. Under the Act of 1902 there was a difficulty in regard to single school districts. He believed that the Amendment would to a great extent remove that difficulty, and unless it was accepted he thought a great injustice would be done to denominational schools. There was no reason why they should not remove an injustice of which complaint had been made in the past, and it was on that ground that he asked the Government to carefully consider the Amendment.

DR. MACNAMARA said he had been struck with the way in which they repeatedly got far away from the real practical day's work of the school, and this Amendment was a case in point. It sounded sweetly reasonable, and in theory nothing could be said against it. The only difficulty about it was that it could not be carried out. Let the Committee observe the curious quarter from which it came. The noble Lord the Member for East Marylebone was one who said they must not violate trusts, and the right hon. Member for Oxford University spoke of the sanctity of trusts and the pious founder. He was sure the pious founder must turn in his grave at this proposal. [" Why ?"] It would introduce into schools set aside for one particular form of religious teaching all sorts of religious teaching. But frankly he did not much care what precise colour of denominational teaching the children got so long as they were kept in one family. He knew that the limited capacity of the child would not permit him to take in all these nice theological points about which the various denominations squabbled and which might very well be left to an older age. But he was violently against the segregation of children of tender age. The moment they said the parents of fifteen children should have the right to demand special facilities the others would want the same. And if they did not want it there would be those who would see that they did. If they let the parents alone they were perfectly satisfied to-day with simple Bible teaching. But they were not let alone. Other reasons were brought to bear, and they were induced to make their demand also. And so far from having all the children together in a common family, with all its admirable advantages from a social side, they would have them set aside in sections, and there would be pandemonium. He had resisted such proposals all through; he had resisted them in 1902, although he had nothing to say in theory in support of the position he took up.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover) said the hon. Member for North Camberwell had admitted that he had nothing to say in theory in support of his argument. What weight, then, was to be attached to it. The hon. Member had said he wished all the children to be kept together, but the Bill prevented it. If that was the ideal they might have left matters where they were. The hon. Member had challenged them to discuss the practical aspect of this matter. He had been told by one who was conversant with the practical aspect that parents would send their children to a Church school or a Roman Catholic school if it was five minutes nearer than a board school. They were satisfied to leave the children together, but the hon. Member was not satisfied to do so. He said the trustees or owners might make a little special caste in the school, and that all the other children might be fished for by other persons.

They were in this Bill, therefore, destroying the first argument which the hon. Member put forward. They had not got this single contented family; it had been shattered. The second argument was no more than a dialectical retort. The hon. Member had pointed out that on the previous night they had dwelt on the sanctity of trusts. That was true, but they said it was not desirable to make so drastic a change in the trusts for an object so small to hon. Members opposite, and so inequitable from the point of view of hon. Gentlemen with whom he sat. If the hon. Member would accept this Amendment there would be something to be said in favour of this violation of trusts. He would have given something in return; he would have recognised for the first time that the spiritual welfare of the children was of more importance than the trusts and the owners. The third argument was that pandemonium would be established; but so far from that being the case, something of this kind did now exist by the goodwill of Churchmen in some parts of the country. If the Goverment did not accept this Amendment they would in practice be taking a reactionary step.

DR. MACNAMARA: Where?

MR. WYNDHAM said that in Dover in the articles of agreement of the church schools provision was made for the right of entry.

DR. MACNAMARA: What use is made of it?

MR. WYNDHAM said that in Dover very little use was made of it, because the people there agreed rather with the first than with the third argument of the hon. Member. They agreed to leave the children together. But at Hythe, seven miles from Dover, where the school was conducted by a clergyman of the Church of England who belonged to what was called by some the High Church party, these facilities were given and were readily availed of. There were forty-seven children in the school being given religious instruction of a character totally distinct and different from the religious teaching this gentleman gave to the other ninety children. So that if the Government resisted this Amendment they would be taking a reactionary step and stopping an amount of religious liberty which did now exist in some parts of the country. As one who had too often and perhaps, sometimes too warmly championed the interest of the Church of England, he might say he supported the Amendment with all his heart, and agreed with every word that had fallen from the hon. Member for West Ham, because he thought it strengthened the defences of religious instruction. In accepting the Amendment the Government would strengthen instead of weakening the defences of religious instruction throughout the country, and they would vindicate themselves from the charges that had been sometimes unjustly preferred against them. For that reason, if for no other, they were entitled to ask the Government's acceptance of the Amendment. If it was accepted it would meet the difficulty pointed out by the hon. Member for the East Toxteth Division of Liverpool, and it would meet the difficulty of the local authority saying to the trustee, "You may have religious instruction on two days a week if you like, because we must take your school." If this Amendment was accepted the difficulty would be met because the parents of the fifteen children might then say, "No, with your permission we will have our way and have on two other days the religious instruction that we wish should be given." The Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Education had urged the Committee not to press this Amendment because this was not the proper place. It never was the proper place, according to the Government, in which to bring forward any general consideration touching the whole question of religious instruction. On one occasion it was a matter of local government and on another that of trust deeds and the extent of their modification. Never until now had it been in order to introduce specific words to show some regard for the religious welfare of the children and the wishes of the parents. If the parents had the right to say "No" to religious instruction of which they did not approve, why should they not have the right to say what kind of religious instruction they would have?

MR. SAMUEL EVANS said it was quite obvious that the Amendment incorporated the principle of the general right of entry, a principle upon which the Committee had already stated its definite opinion. He objected to the Amendment both in theory and in practice. Nothing could be more detrimental to the interests of the children than their being divided into pens. It was certainly curious as coming from the noble Lord that he was willing that a Methodist, an Anabaptist, a Buddhist, or a Jew, should come into a little school and get his little scholars into a corner so that he might teach them sectarianism. This was not religious teaching at all, but the teaching of sectarianism. He would ask the hon. Member for North West Ham whether any of his Nonconformist constituents asked for this right of entry.

MR. MASTERMAN said it was a promise he made to his Nonconformist constituents.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS said what he desired to know was whether any Nonconformist constituent asked his hon. friend for a right of entry into denominational schools which did not belong to them. It was right that they who represented Nonconformists in this House should say that Nonconformists—not because they did not desire that religious teaching should be given to the children—expressly stated that they did not want in State schools either at their own expense, or at the expense of the State, or in any way whatever, to teach sectarianism in the schools.

LORD R. CECIL said that the hon. Member assumed that denominational teaching was sectarianism. Members of the Church of England and of the Church of Rome believed that religion consisted in belonging to a communion. It was the gross intolerance of people outside this House, who urged the hon. and learned Gentleman to make this kind of observation, that prevented a settlement of the religious question.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS said he did not complain of the noble Lord speaking strongly, because he held strong convictions on the subject, but for that very reason others should also be allowed to speak strongly. In the view of Nonconformists, Anglicans and Roman Catholics were members of sects. What was behind this proposal? If the Amendment were accepted, there would be no answer to the claim that the same righ of entry should be given in the case o all provided schools.

LORD R. CECIL: I said so.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS said that in that case the Committee would know how to deal with the Amendment, which would introduce strife into a number of schools. Under the circumstances he hoped the Ministerial side of the Committee would be unanimous, with the one exception of his hon. friend the Member for North West Ham.

*EARL PERCY (Kensington, S.) sincerely trusted the Government would think twice before rejecting the Amendment. He had always been in favour of the right of entry in all schools. The true principle was that every child as far as possible should be brought up in the denominational belief of its parents. Unless some such Amendment were accepted, there would be no guarantee that even a majority of the children would receive any religious education at all. The President of the Board of Education had removed a great blot in the Bill by the Amendment he accepted yesterday to Clause 2 at the suggestion of the hon. Member for Oxford University. The right hon. Gentleman at all events rendered it possible for the owners to make it a condition that besides the facilities for a certain number of children there should be compulsorily given at least Cowper-Temple teaching to the rest of the children in the schools. But supposing the owners did not make that stipulation, and the local authority having provided special facilities did not want to give Cowper-Temple teaching in addition, then there was no guarantee that some of the children would receive any kind of religious instruction. That was not a state of things they could look upon with equanimity. He had always thought that the main objection to the system of 1870 was not so much that Cowper-Temple teaching was unsatisfactory or that favouritism was shown to one form of religious belief, but that it was left to the option of a local authority to deprive children of the most elementary religious education. If the Government could not accept the words of the Amendment, he hoped they would introduce some words to compel the local authority to give some religious teaching to the children attending voluntary schools, whose parents did not belong to the denomination to which facilities were accorded.

MR. RAWLINSON (Cambridge University) believed that on this line only could a permanent settlement of the difficulty be found. He advocated the Amendment as a stepping-stone to three other conditions, namely, that the religious education should be given by the school teachers, in the school hours, and that it should be of universal application. Why was it the hon. Member for North Camberwell was invariably getting up in his place and saying—"You cannot do it because I say so?" The right of entry was working well at the present time in the Poor Law schools of England. In the model rules issued by the Secretary of State, which existed even so far back as the last Liberal Government, it was laid down with regard to reformatory schools that in the case of those children who were specified in the order of detention as belonging to a particular religious persuasion the managers should, so far as practicable, make arrangements that, during the time set apart for religious instruction, they should have such instruction imparted by ministers of such persuasion or by such responsible teachers of the schools or other persons delegated by the ministers with the approval of the managers. [AN HON. MEMBER: Does that apply to ordinary school hours?] As a matter of fact it did, although it was not in the rules. Only one case had been mentioned by the hon. Member for North Camberwell in which the system had broken down. The same system was in operation in Germany, and it worked without any difficulty. It might be said that there were fewer denominations in Germany, but even in this country they would find that the number of denominations in any particular school was very few, especially in the rural districts. In a Church of England school the probabilities were that the different Nonconformists who attended that school would be content with one teacher of a particular kind and one form of teaching. In other cases where denominational differences were more acute his argument was all the stronger, because if the members of the Nonconformist body did not agree upon a common teacher they would be entitled to have a separate teacher. The bedrock and basis of this proposal was exactly what the hon. Member for Mid. Glamorgan had swept aside. The point was whether the people of England as a whole did not prefer denominational teaching for their children. He thought they did. In his opinion denominational teaching had taken a hold in this country and had become an integral part of the educational system. In the debate on the Act of 1902 the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that denominational schools were an integral portion of our educational system, and the Minister for War had declared that he had never been an objector to denominational education. The Secretary for Foreign Affairs also had declared that if there were alternative schools he should not press his objection to rate-aided denominational schools. Therefore he was justified in saying that there were in the Cabinet a number of Ministers who recognised that denominationalism was an integral part of the religious education of the country. The people desired denominationalism and why should it not be the basis of education? He submitted that it was upon these lines that they were likely to arrive at a permanent settlement of the question. He asked the Government seriously to consider this Amendment as what he earnestly believed to be the basis of a settlement of the religious difficulty, Sooner or later it would have to be adopted, and under it they would give every parent the opportunity of having his child taught the religon of the denomination to which he belonged.

MR. BIRRELL said he could assure the hon. and learned Member for Cambridge University that he took this Amendment quite seriously, and he wished to give some evidence of his own solemnity. The whole of this question was a very serious one, but he desired to point out that it had already been dealt with, and that the Government had expressed their opinion upon it. It was hardly reasonable, therefore, that hon. Members opposite should expect a detailed reply from him now. The history of the clause showed how difficult it was to please people. The Committee had been told by the noble Lord and by the right hon. Member for Dover that they did not care about property. But these trust schools were concerned with property and the Commission might have to consider "Aye" or "No" whether a particular school ought to be transferred to the local education authority, and how far the new school, when transferred, could be said properly to be a school for carrying out the trusts established in the deeds. That was the reason why they had provided that when a school was taken over the conditions were to be mandatory, enabling Church of England, Wesleyans, or other denominational schools to be taken over and to have facilities for instructing the children in the special views of the denomination to which the school belonged. That was their purpose and everybody would agree that it was an honourable purpose. That was the desire of the Government, and, if all went well, he thought people would be amazed to find how admirably it would work, and he felt quite sure that the children themselves would not discover that this marvellous Act had come into law. The noble Lord had put a point which had been often in the mind of the Government, namely, that a county council could not be expected to have imposed on them as a matter of obligation the giving of what was called "Cowper-Templeism" instruction. The Committee would see from the partial but satisfactory return which had been laid on the Table of the House the state of the case and the nature of the syllabuses that were in actual use by the local education authorities. He recommended any hon. Member who wished to spend a profitable Sunday to read that remarkable document showing what Cowper-Templeism might be, what it was among the great majority of educational authorities in England, and what an invaluable system of religious instruction it was. The noble Lord suggested that it should be made obligatory.

LORD R. CECIL: Where the parents demanded it.

MR. BIRRELL: Obligatory to do what? He could not settle the form of syllabus, for an unwilling educational authority might decree a very insufficient system of Cowper-Templeism. His objection to the noble Lord's suggestion was that the Government had made up their minds not to make Cowper-Templeism obligatory on the county council and the local education authority, but to leave them the option which the law had for so long a time afforded to them. Having regard to the pledges of the Government in this matter it was idle to press upon them the adoption of this Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said the fact that the right hon. Gentleman remained obstinately convinced that his solution, or want of solution, of the education question was the one to which he intended to adhere did not absolve the Opposition from the duty of pressing a different point of view. When this question was discussed on an earlier occasion the debate was most inadequate, for it arose during the unfortunate time of the dinner hour, when, under the new rules, hon. Members were expected to do two things at the same time. It would be apparent, he thought, that that discussion, and the present discussion, had been of great use in connection with the problem. He had been attacked by the hon. Member for North West Ham for not dealing with this matter in the Act of 1902, and for not attempting to give any effect then to the principles advocated by the noble Lord the Member for East Marylebone. Let the Committee consider what the position then was. He held then, and he held now, that there were two inequalities and injustices involved in the legislation of 1870, and which were not remedied by the Act of 1902—the injustice of the single-school area and the injustice of requiring the teaching of Cowper-Templeism. These two defects in the Act of 1870 and the system which it established remained unremedied up to the present time. Had it been possible—and everybody knew that it was not possible—to deal with that in the Act of 1902, they might have introduced universally a system that would have wholly removed the injustice of the single school area, and had the effect at the same time of giving a great shock to the hon. and learned Member for Mid Glamorganshire, who for some reason he had never been able to understand regarded Cowper-Temple teaching as the very bulwark of Nonconformity.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS: I have never held that view.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR admitted that the phrase he had used was one of his own coining, but he believed it expressed the hon. Member's view. The hon. Member and his friends had always regarded it as something almost sacrosanct which Parliament ought never to be allowed under any circumstances to touch. They had always regarded this as the limitation which local authorities ought to maintain.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS: My position always has been, and is now, that Nonconformity as such has nothing at all to do with denominational religion in the schools, and that Nonconformists do believe in most cases in simple Bible teaching, which is Cowper-Temple teaching.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said it was not what the Nonconformists desired he was discussing; it was their determination that nobody else who had hitherto provided schools should have what they wanted. In the present amendment they could not touch the second half of that particular form of remedy known as "facilities." They could only touch the part relating to the voluntary schools, and he did not believe that if this half were adopted the Committee would be able to touch the other half. Were it adopted by the Committee, it would be not only a first step, but a long step, in the direction of freeing the local authorities from the Cowper-Temple clause and giving to the parents the right of getting denominational teaching in provided schools. It was not on that account, however, that he would raise objection to the Amendment. If objection was to be raised, it should be because it only went a little way in dealing with a half of the evil. Did hon. Members think that the argument which they had advanced on the practical side possessed all the weight they attached to it? The practical argument was a physical argument, namely, that they could not find the space or the conveniences to teach the scholars in sections. In so far as that objection was real — and it might be real in small schools—it could be met by the words "as far as practicable." But the Committee should also look at the practical difficulty on its moral side. It was apparently regarded as inimical to all the best interests of the children that they should recognise at an early age that, in addition to their common Christianity, their parents belonged to different denominations. But surely that fact could not be concealed from the children, and no parent would wish to conceal it. Any parent bringing up his child at home would tell him, "I am a member of such-and-such a Christian communion, and I hope that you will also belong and be an ornament to that communion." That was what had happened in the teaching at home. Was there anything in the view of attempting to give the same teaching in the school which would prevent the children from living in amity together or which would accentuate the religious difficulties which existed? He could not believe that this was the view of the Government, because he found in one of their educational measures this identical provision, declaring that as far as practicable facilities should be given in schools for the blind, that the children should receive the religious instruction, and attend the religious services according to the persuasion of the parents. This was the object of his noble friend, and he could not see why the system which was practicable in a particular kind of school should be declared to be impracticable in the schools with which the Committee were now dealing. Surely it was manifest that the argument if applicable to one kind of education was equally applicable to another. He would go further, and would remind the Committee that in Scotland this plan was carried out without difficulty and without offence, without the production of any of the evils alleged in respect of many schools. The Committee ought not rashly to say that it was wholly impossible for an Englishman to do that which Scotsmen found to be easy. Ought not this fact to modify the attitude of critics as to this particular plan? It was logical in its completeness, and its justice, at all events as far as paper provisions were concerned, had been admitted by its severest critics. Practice and theory were thus not so far apart as hon. Members opposite would ask the Committee to believe, and therefore the Amendment deserved more favourable treatment than had been accorded to it by the Government. The Government had shown themselves to be content with the inchoate, truncated, and inverted solution contained in the Bill, declaring their intention to bring up modifications and amendments to be submitted hereafter. Though this particular Amendment gave small opportunity of dealing with the larger question, he thought that it deserved greater breadth of treatment and a greater effort at argumentative reply than it had received either from the Parliamentary Secretary or the Minister for Education.

SIR W. ROBSON said that he would endeavour to supply from the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman himself arguments against the Amendment. A similar Amendment was brought forward when the Act of 1902 was under discussion, and though the right hon. Gentleman expressed a certain amount of sympathy with its object, he dealt a little more fully with it than he had attempted on this occasion. He thought a sufficient reply to the Amendment was to be found in the expressions which the right hon. Gentleman used four years ago on a similar occasion. Speaking on November 25th, 1902, the right hon. Gentleman said that he had prepared an Amendment not covering all the ground of another proposal which had been made, but covering the particular subject of single school areas. He explained, however, that he had not proceeded with that Amendment for two reasons. He said—

> "One reason was that he felt perfectly confident that any such Amendment moved by the Government would create an enormous amount of controversy and friction inside and outside the House. It was perfectly true, as his noble friend had said, that there was a great body of opinion—of very highly instructed opinion—in the country which desired to see some such solution as this of our religious difficulties. That was absolutely true, but he was convinced that when the great body of the people whom the Amendment concerned and whom his Amendment would have concerned—the country clergy and the Nonconformist ministers all over the kingdom, and that great body of the teaching profession—considered the proposal they would unite in the strongest opposition to it."

The right hon. Gentleman described the objection which the country clergy would have, then what the Nonconformist ministers would say, and he said the teaching profession would unanimously object. The right hon. Gentleman did not base his case on inference or prediction. He went on and gave instances. He mentioned Birmingham. He was not aware, by the way, that any Birmingham Members had given the Committee the benefit of their experience in that debate. The right hon. Gentleman pointed out that in the case of Birmingham the result had been failure. He brought forward practical objections and appealed to experience. Referring to the reasons of the failure at Birmingham, the right hon. Gentleman said that by universal consent the plan did not carry out either the intention or the wishes of its framers. Why? Because there was a great difficulty in getting a sufficient number of voluntary teachers—notwithstanding that Birmingham was a city where public spirit was so abundant—and because the teachers they did get were not able to teach. Teaching was not quite so simple a matter as it was supposed to be by those who brought in Amendments of this kind. It was found that to have at intervals in the school a number of teachers who could not teach was subversive of all discipline. The Amendment, he noticed, was founded on the admission of the gross and scandalous injustice of the existing system. The Leader of the Opposition had indicated that he felt some difficulty in the existing system in single school districts. There were 5,600 districts in England where the Church of England had the only school. It had been said that the last thing they thought of was proselytising. In these debates, however, it had been admitted that religion could not be taught at all unless the children were taught that they should belong to a denomination. That was the injustice this Bill was intended to remedy. When the Government went to the country on this Bill—he did not mean on a dissolution or an election—they would be able to tell the electors what had hitherto been denied—that in Church schools children must be taught to belong to a denomination. It was contended that there was no valuable religion except sectarian religion. He did not believe that. It was of the essence of the Bill that among Protestant communities common worship was possible. There could be no comparison between the effect on the mind of a child of rote learning and the repetition of creeds and the effect of common worship—the common hymn and the common prayer. He thought the Amendment had served its purpose. The alternative proposed by the Opposition had been denounced by their leader as hopelessly impossible, and it was condemned by the experience of Birmingham, so that both leaders of the Tory Party got a certain kind of approach to union on this subject. But it was an alternative which sought to shut out common worship from the school life of Protestant children.

*LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley) said he wished to express his deep and sincere regret at the unduly provocative tone of the Solicitor-General's speech, and at the expressions which the hon. and learned Gentleman had used. Nothing said by the noble Lord the Member for East Marylebone could in any sense, whatever, be considered to have given any cause for offence to any Nonconformist. The provocative portions of the Solicitor-General's speech, however, seemed to him to have been deliberately directed against the bona fides of the Church of England and the way in which they conducted their worship. [Cries of "No."] Well, that was the impression which was left upon his mind.

SIR W. ROBSON said the impression of the noble Lord was not justified by anything he had said. To suggest that he had made any reflections upon the Church of England could not be justified, and the assertion was entirely without foundation.

*LORD BALCARRES said he could not remember the exact phrase, but it was something about mumbled creeds and the repetition by rote which characterised their services. He considered that was an unduly provocative and offensive attack upon the Church of England. [Cries of "Withdraw," and "Order, order!"] He was perfectly in order in stating that that was his understanding of the speech.

MR. AINSWORTH (Argyllshire) asked whether the noble Lord was in order in using the word "offensive."

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN (Mr. CALDWELL, Lanarkshire, Mid.) said it was not an unparliamentary word.

*LORD BALCARRES said the Solicitor-General had stated that experiments in the direction of the Amendment had been tried at Birmingham and elsewhere and had failed. The hon. and learned Gentleman appeared to think that it was the failure to secure the required number of teachers which was one of the contributory causes of the failure of that experiment. There was, however, no want of teachers in Birmingham, but it was a lack of skill in the teachers which was experienced, and not a lack of numbers. Of course, as had been stated, teaching was not a simple matter, and if in Birmingham a difficulty was found in getting a sufficient number of teachers in regard to schools which might come under Clause 4, how much greater would be the difficulty of securing teachers who must come under Clause 3. It was all very well to say that teachers to give this particular kind of instruction could not be got in Birmingham. It might be true, and he was not very familiar with the details of that particular case. His impression was, however, that in that case teaching was given outside school hours, and the discipline had to be maintained by professional teachers who were brought in for this duty, as a sort of extra to the duties which they were paid to perform. That must have made the experiment unpopular among the teachers. He thought the hon. and learned Member had given the case away when he admitted that the teaching was not an easy matter, when he contended that in places like Birmingham it was impossible to find a sufficient number of properly trained men, and when he said that in urban districts under Clause 3 they were not to have the professional services of the teacher, but must rely upon the volunteer. That would render it all the more difficult for the teaching to be given successfully, and when they reached Clause 7 it would be an argument for giving the privilege to professional teachers to exercise the option of giving this instruction.

*MR. NUSSEY (Pontefract) said he did not find himself in agreement with the Government, and regretted that they did not see their way to accept the Amendment. So long as we had religious teaching in this country the parents of a child had a right to have arrangements made for the kind of religious teaching which they desired. He regretted that the Government did not see their way to deal with that difficulty, and he especially regretted the heated eloquence with which the Solicitor-General had referred to the religious denomination of which he himself was a humble member. In the first place it was said that they would have a pandemonium if all the religious denominations imparted instruction in the village school on a particular day. He did not think there was any substance in that argument, and he ventured to disagree with those who urged that view. The argument as to trust deeds also had no validity, since in 1902 the right hon. Gentleman had made an end of the trust deeds of voluntary schools. Then they were told that the parents did not want this particular kind of instruction. Which statement were they to believe—the statement that the parents did not want it at all, or that their wanting it would cause a pandemonium? They were told that the Amendment was opposed to the best interests of the children, but he thought the best interests of the children were best provided for, so long as there was religious teaching provided in the schools in the creed in which the parents of the children believed and in the creed in which they were educated at home. If the parents of children demanded dogmatic teaching in such cases, he did not think that Cowper-Templeism would advance the cause of religion much, whereas the Amendment proposed a logical solution which would stave off a resort to purely secular education in the schools. For that reason he found himself unable to support the Government in the attitude which they had taken up.

*COLONEL WILLIAMS (Dorsetshire, W.) said that like the hon. Gentleman opposite he regretted the heat which the Solicitor-General had imported into the debate. The hon. and learned Gentleman was wrong in his facts, because he represented that the effect of this Amendment would be to do away with that which they on that side of the House valued as much as hon. Members opposite, namely, common worship. The reverse was the case, for the Government had already yielded that when facilities were given for denominational teaching on two days, on the other three days undenominational teaching might be given. What was desired to be taught was that though beliefs might differ, yet common worship was possible; and they should have denominational teaching on two days in the week, and common teaching on all the others. The hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to be oblivious of the progress which the country was making in regard to this question of religious education. They were asked what was the use of making speeches when the Government had made up their minds in regard to what they were going to do, but the value of making them was to be found not in the answers which might be given to them inside the House, but in the answers they got outside the House. At that moment he had in his pockets letters which contained two of strongest pieces of evidence possible that the country was rapidly coming round to the acceptance of universal facilities for all kinds of denominational education in every school. At the general election he obtained considerably more Nonconformist votes than he thought he would, because he consistently preached at his meetings the doctrine that this was not a question of Protestantism. Nor was it. If it were it would be a case of persecution, because it meant that some people would say, "I am a Protestant, and in this matter I will have my way, and those who are not Protestants shall not have theirs." That was persecution of the worst kind. But Protestantism did not enter into this question in any way. If they proved that Romanising doctrines were taught in many more Church schools than hon. Members even in their wildest moments imagined, what had that to do with education? If that was thought, it meant that those who held that view were going to force their own system of education on every body in the country, because they thought it was right. The hon. Member for Mid. Glamorgan said he did not want any facilities. But what about those who did? Were they not to have them? The hon. Member for Mid. Glamorgan said "No, certainly not." But it was a religious question dealing with men's consciences, and was this Committee going to fetter men's consciences because they themselves did not want facilities? The hon. Member for North Camberwell spoke of breaking up the family life in the school, but the school was not a family institution, it was a civil institution. The family was a divine institution with the divine responsibility of parents to children and children to parents.

DR. MACNAMARA: Family life in the schools.

*COLONEL WILLIAMS: But it was not family life, it was school life. He wanted to make school life as harmonious as possible, but they were not going to do it by teaching the children that the parents' religion was all wrong and did not matter. If they gave them Cowper-Temple teaching in the schools they must go further and say that that satisfied them for their school life, and that it ought to satisfy them for the whole of their lives.

DR. MACNAMARA: Who does that?

*COLONEL WILLIAMS said no one, and they did not want to see it done. But they must not talk of family life in the schools. They wanted to teach the children on two days a week that there was such a thing as denominational religion. They wanted them to live together and worship together; but they did not want them taken out of their religion. The true religion that they wanted to teach was not merely definite religion, but the unity of the religion of Christianity, and that though they might differ in the application, it was the same Christianity. If it was real Christianity, and they were to let the children grow up Christians, they must not stop any religion they could give. It was the neglect and carelessness on the part of the parents that they had to fight, and if they got the parents of only five children to say they desired that on two days a week definite religious instruction should be given to their children, for God's sake let them give it. Let them give them instruction on the unity of Christianity on three days a week, but if anybody said they wanted their child taught the doctrines of Roman Catholicism, or any other doctrine, let the child be taught what its parents desired. Let the parents have their facilities in the name of freedom. That was the true principle of freedom and a stepping-stone to a real universal system. Every child in every school should have exactly the same opportunities of receiving undenominational teaching, because in that way they would strengthen what they all desired to strengthen, namely, the Christian religion which, although they differed in the application of it, was the same Christian religion in which they all worshipped.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said the Amendment seemed so reasonable on the face of it that they might have considerable difficulty in voting against it. But, as often happened, other countries gave them a clue to what it really meant. In Ireland they had a system of education founded on combined secular and separate religious instruction. Under that system it was competent to teach all forms of religion as the parents of the children might desire. What had the result been? It had resulted in this, that the whole system, designed to be a national system, had developed into an open denominational system, and each of the sects did not keep its religion in the schools, but had got a school for itself, with the result that there were small schools, and inefficient because they were small. The whole system had broken down, and it was now frankly denominational. He agreed with the hon. Member for North Camberwell that it was pretty much like introducing pandemonium into the schools. The Irish people found that out very quickly: each sect built its own school, and hundreds of those schools were inefficient because they were small. He would be no party to hunting Christianity out of the schools, but then what was this that he heard about Cowper-Temple religion? Did not the last speaker believe that the Cowper-Temple system at all events was practical Christianity? Were not the foundations of Christianity taught under the Cowper-Temple system? After all, what were they going to teach children beyond the foundations of Christianity? What did they know about Creeds? He wished they could be prevented from learning them till they were very much older. He would vote against the Amendment simply because the same system had broken down in Ireland, and he believed it would introduce pandemonium in England.

*MR. J. WARD (Stoke-on-Trent) said if they only considered what the proposition amounted to, they would see that it was absolutely impossible to carry it out. It meant that probably one person, and very often not more than two, and occasionally perhaps three, would be able practically to disarrange the whole of the ordinary teaching in the school by the demand for special facilities. Let them imagine the difficulty of allotting the time. Supposing four or five claims were made for special facilities in the school—because there was no reason, if this Amendment was passed, why the Wesleyans and the Unitarians, and the Methodists and the Baptists and everybody else should not make a claim. Many of the schools affected were one-roomed schools, and he could picture in his mind's eye how they were going to mark them out, this the Baptist corner and that the Wesleyan corner, and another the Roman Catholic corner. It was only necessary to imagine it, to see how utterly ridiculous and confusing such a practice would be.

MR. PAUL (Northampton): And the Atheists.

*MR. WARD: Yes, if there was a demand for atheistic teaching that would also be included. How the system could be managed he could not for the life of him imagine. Under these circumstances he thought the Attorney-General was absolutely justified in his criticism.

*MR. NIELD (Middlesex, Ealing) said he was glad to follow the hon. Member who had just resumed his seat for he had addressed a meeting of 5,000 Churchmen at Hanley adjoining Stoke-upon-Trent and an open-air meeting of 2,000 people, at both of which meetings the Bill had been discussed and resolutions passed without a single dissentient voice denouncing and disapproving of its provisions. At any rate Churchmen of North Staffordshire were resolved to give this Bill their uncompromising opposition.

MR. WARD: A few days after that I addressed a meeting in the Market Hall, Longton, of about 10,000 people.

*MR. NIELD said he was of course without any information as to the meeting referred to by the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, but none the less those 7,000 people whom he addressed might be trusted to do their duty in regard to this Bill when the opportunity arose. He regretted exceedingly the bitter and sarcastic speech of the Solicitor-General. The Amendment did nothing more than give parents the right to be heard. They were asking for religious freedom for the parents. In the spirit in which they had been met by the Government to-day they could hope for nothing, but he believed that if they could appeal to the country the religious freedom which they desired would not be refused. A prominent supporter of the Government and a loyal Churchman recently told him that he opposed this Bill, although he was an earnest Liberal, because it departed from every principle of Liberalism, and from the elementary principles of liberty. That was the foundation upon which he based his opposition to this Bill. [Cries of "Question."] It was the question whether the parents of fifteen children attending any public elementary school should have religious teaching——

THE CHAIRMAN: That is not the Amendment. The proposal under discussion relates to transferred voluntary schools.

*MR. NIELD said he was dealing with the principle as to whether the parents of fifteen children attending any transferred voluntary school were to have an opportunity of saying whether their children should be allowed to have special facilities. If this Bill was supposed to give religious freedom it could only be religious freedom for the parents, because the children were not old enough to understand religious questions, nor could it be supposed that they should be called upon to make any such election. Surely it was only the barest justice that this concession should be made. If the country was asked to pronounce upon the question whether it was considered satisfactory that the schools should have these facilities for only two days a week, he had no doubt whatever as to the conclusion they would arrive at.

*MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs) said that upon this question he was somewhat astonished at the triple alliance between the Catholics and the Church and the secularists. It was true that adversity made strange bedfellows, but it was very significant that the Church and the secularists, who were opposite as the poles, should be combining against religious instruction. Both religious parties in his own constituency were agreed in urgently desiring to have religious instruction.

LORD R. CECIL: This Amendment does not provide for the abolition of religious instruction.

*MR. REES said it made religious instruction impracticable, and it always seemed to him that the noble Lord's arguments proceeded upon wrong lines historically. His claim was that whatever was conceded to the Catholics should be conceded to the Anglican Church. [Cries of "Why not?"] The Catholic case was that the Bible should be interpreted by a priest. Was that the case of the Church of England?

MR. J. WARD, on a point of order, asked whether the subjects which the hon. Member for Montgomery Boroughs was discussing had anything at all to do with the Amendment before the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think the matter is decidedly wide.

*MR. REES said that almost every other speaker had gone on lines wide enough to embrace the question he alluded to, but he would leave it out. It seemed to him to be absolutely impracticable to do what the noble Lord desired by this Amendment. How was it possible to carry out these religious facilities? He felt sometimes that any man who had spent most of his life abroad was rather disqualified from dealing with the ethical and religious aspects of these questions in the House. He had, however, taken considerable pains to investigate the kind of religion given under the Cowper-Temple Clause, and after visiting numerous schools he confessed that he thought Cowper-Templeism was a most excellent foundation for religion, such as any Christian of any persuasion might allow his child to receive in its tender years. He thought denominational instruction upon two days a week was sufficient for all practical purposes, and would give a foundation for religion such as the Church of England, the Free Churches, and in fact any Christian Church might accept.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member appears to be speaking upon the religious teaching which is to be given, and that is not in order.

*MR. REES claimed that the Free Churches were as sincere with regard to religious instruction as the Church of England, and it might be taken for granted that there was equal sincerity on both sides. The case for Liberal Churchmen had been dealt with by the hon. Member for Northampton. He might say that he had received a good many resolutions from rural deaneries and other Church associations in his constituency, and he could not honestly say that they were satisfied with the Bill, and regarded the agitation against this measure as being purely ecclesiastical, as the hon. Member had claimed.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must warn the hon. Member that he is becoming highly irrelevant.

*MR. REES said his constituency was determined to have religious instruction. It would be different if they could say with Tacitus "Deorum injurias Diis curœ," but the country would not take that view, and as it wanted religious teaching, practicable religious teaching should be given, and he would support this section of the Bill as it stood and oppose the Amendment.

MR. BIRRELL expressed the hope that the Amendment might be withdrawn, or at any rate a vote taken upon it, in order that the rest of the time at their disposal might be devoted to the further consideration of the clause. He hoped that the noble Lord would not feel that he was speaking disrespectfully of his Amendment, but the point had already been dealt with by the Government in a previous debate, and there could be no alteration in regard to the position of the Government in this matter.

TELELRS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Whiteley and Mr. J. A. Pease.

MR. J. W. WILSON (Worcestershire, N.) moved that the words at the end of Sub-section (1) limiting the special religious instruction to two mornings a week should be omitted, and that the Sub-section should simply enable children whose parents so wished to "receive such instruction." The object of the Amendment was to open up the question whether "special religious instruction' was to be given on one, two, three, four, or five days a week. There was up and down the country a certain amount of feeling of hardship with regard to the limitation of days in the clause, and personally he should like to hear the views of the Government on the question why the matter could not be left perfectly open to the local education authority and the trustees to decide the number of days. If that were done, probably the result would be that in a great majority of the schools not more than one or two days would be taken. He thought that in many Anglican schools Cowper-Temple teaching would be welcomed. If they had accepted the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for East Marylebone in regard to all schools, whether denominational or provided, it would have been desirable to limit to one or two the days on which religious teaching of a special character should be permitted. But if it were confined to the transferred schools, he could see very little risk of difficulty arising if the question were left entirely open. In most Church schools the removal of the limitation would not lead to the extension of the teaching. But he would not force co-religionists who now gave special religious instruction oftener, and desired to continue it, or who felt that they would be at a disadvantage compared with another Church which under Clause 4 would give such instruction every day in the week, to become, or threaten to become, passive resisters on account of this limitation.

"In page 2, line 34, to leave out from the word 'receive,' to the end of the Sub-section, and insert the words 'such instruction.'"—(Mr. J. W. Wilson.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'that instruction' stand part of the Clause."

MR. BIRRELL said the Amendment would remove the restriction by which facilities for religious instruction were limited to two mornings a week, and allow it to be given on every day of the week. It was quite impossible for the Government to accede to that. They had given the matter full consideration, and two mornimgs a week were selected, because the result of their inquiries showed that that was the maximum amount of such instruction customarily given in the Church schools of the country. That was no reflection upon those schools. It was simply an educational limitation prescribed, after long experience, as being a sufficient number of days for catechetical and strictly denominational instruction. He ventured to say that these were the methods and principles on which Church of England schools had heen carried on for a hundred years, and the Government proposed to adhere to their ancient usage.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was hardly satisfactory, for reasons which he would at once appreciate. What the right hon. Gentleman appeared to have done was to take the average of the practice in the Church of England schools, and to say that that average was to be obligatory upon each unit on which the average was taken. He saw no rationale in that principle at all. It might be true that, for reasons purely educational, and also for other reasons which might attach to the fact that in the Church of England schools there was a great anxiety to meet the wishes of parents who did not belong to the Church of England, there was a large number of schools, perhaps a majority, in which the catechism was taught on only two days a week; but on what principle they were going to take that average as the obligatory and statutory maximum he failed to understand. But before he pressed that question, he should like to ask the Minister for Education a question upon the interpretation of his own provision. The right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Gentleman who had moved the Amendment appeared to think that only on two days a week was any teaching of the Church Catechism permissible. On the other hand, the view of many of his hon. friends was that "two days" meant two days for any given child—that no child in any transferred school should be taught denominational religion on more than two days a week. That was an eminently more reasonable proposition than the proposition which the hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment seemed to think was embodied in the Bill, and which was countenanced by the Minister for Education viz., that the denominational teacher should not be permitted on more than two days a week to deal with the subject at all. He asked the Committee to observe the gross and palpable injustice of that last provision. In the voluntary schools there were children of all ages from three or four to fourteen or fifteen. Manifestly the same education of any kind, denominational or undenominational, was not suitable to children of very tender years, as might be suitable to a child of ten, twelve, or fourteen. Therefore, if religion, or anything else, was to be taught to the best advantage, the children must be divided into classes selected according to the age, progress, and intellectual aptitudes of the children. If only two days a week were allowed for denominational teaching to the children at school, it was evident that the denominational teacher would be unable to have small classes according to age and capacity. If they limited the teaching to two days a week in schools where Church children were in a majority, the classes would necessarily be large, and composed of children of different ages, to whom different teaching ought to be given, and that would be quite arbitrarily and most cruelly to diminish the efficiency of the religious teaching in those schools. These were two quite different policies. He thought the first—the most tolerant and the broadest minded—was that which the Government intended to adopt, but evidently the hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment did not think they meant to adopt it, and he wished to put the Bill in a far more intelligible shape. It did not appear to have occurred to the Minister for Education that the interpretation they had put on the Bill could be the true one, but, whether it was the interpretation which a lawyer would put upon it, or not, it was the interpretation which a statesman ought to desire to put upon it. It did no injury to any human being, it did not add to the power of any denomination, and it did not injure the children of any other denomination. All it did was to permit the organisation of religious teaching in voluntary schools to be conducted on the principle accepted in regard to every other kind of teaching. It enabled classes to be formed according to age, and in such a manner that they could be taught with real advantage by a competent teacher. To limit the possibility of denominational teaching to two days a week, and to compel the teacher to have one large class for the advanced child of fourteen or fifteen and the child of three or four, who ought hardly to be permitted to be at school at all, was surely one of the most irrational, intolerant, and cruel provisions that could be imagined to introduce into a Bill. He hoped they would be assured that, by a slip, the Minister for Education had misunderstood his own Bill, or, if that were not the case, that he was prepared to make his Bill what they on the Opposition side of the House had conceived it to be.

MR. BIRRELL said that the words of the clause were "afford those facilities by enabling children whose parents wished them to receive religious instruction of that special character to receive that instruction on not more than two mornings in the week."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear.

MR. BIRRELL said he did not dispute the view taken by the right hon. Gentleman. His speech in reply to the Amendment was based on the assumption that denominational teaching was to be given on two days of the week, and two days only. But he quite admitted that the wording of the clause which he had quoted enabled religious instruction to be given, in order to meet the necessities of a school, on more than two days, provided that it was given to no child on more than two.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In other words, there may be denominational teaching on five days in the voluntary schools provided that no individual child received religious teaching on more than two days.

MR. CAVE said he would like it to be clearly understood whether the owners of voluntary schools could stipulate that denominational teaching must be given on two mornings of the week.

*MR. PERKS said he was bound to say that the interpretation put upon this clause by the Minister for Education was a revelation to many on the Ministerial side of the House. Sometimes there were extraordinary pitfalls in those subtly-drawn clauses which were a perplexity to plain men of business. But he was sure that the view which the Minister had taken of this particular clause was not the view which prevailed in the country. The view of this particular clause taken at large in the country was that simple Bible teaching was to be the ordinary religious instruction in the schools, and that, if anything more was required of a sectarian, dogmatic, or ecclesiastical nature, it was to be given outside the school hours. [OPPOSITION cries of "No."] Whether that extra denominational teaching was to be allowed within the school hours, was a question which would have to be fought later on. All that was to be given in ordinary school hours was simple Bible instruction, or Cowper-Temple instruction, or whatever other name they might give it. At present there was no provision in the Bill to provide that this special instruction under Clauses 3 and 4, be it of a sectarian, dogmatic, or ecclesiastical nature, was to be given in school hours.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is accepted by the Government.

*MR. PERKS said he did not understand that the Government had made any such promise, but he would not argue that point now, as it did not arise, but the contention of the Leader of the Opposition was that on every morning of the week a minister of religion should be admitted to the schools to give religious instruction if the parents demanded it. Then, what became of the unfortunate parents of the children of dissenting communions? It was perfectly clear that the interpretation put upon the clause by the Minister for Education, that in the case of every National school which might be transferred the parish clergyman might enter it on every morning of the week to give religious instruction, was not the interpretation put upon it by the country. He had taken out the figures of some schools in his own division of Lincolnshire; and he found that out of sixteen schools, in only two did the parson come in to give religious instruction on two mornings a week; in three schools he went in on one morning a week, and into the remaining eleven he never went at all.

MR. BIRRELL said that his hon. friend who had just spoken was in error, and therefore he wished to reply at once. They were now dealing with Clause 3, which was confined to the trust of the particular school, and no other person was to be permitted within the walls of that school except the person who was to carry out the teaching of the denomination or trust to which it belonged. If it was a Wesleyan school no one but a person instructing in the doctrine of John Wesley would have any access to that school at all.

*MR. PERKS: He would not do it.

MR. BIRRELL: Then they might eliminate all outsiders from their consideration, because the only person who would have access to the school was the person who was qualified to give denominational teaching of the denomination to which the school belonged. Therefore, they got rid of the constant incursion of rival religions. Then another question arose which, in his opinion, was a matter of pure business dealing between the persons who made these bargains and the persons who were entitled to the benefit of the Bill. What was to be done in very large schools? In his own district of London there was one school with about 1,300 children. Supposing this school came under the facilities granted by Clause 3, how was the teaching to be carried out? The children were entitled to be taught the tenets of the denomination to which the school belonged, and the children were to have it at the expense of the rates on not more than two mornings a week if their parents wished it. If a hard and fast rule were to be laid down that every child in that school was to have denominational teaching on the same two mornings in the week, whether the number was 400 or 1,300, the teachers would not be forthcoming and the facilities could not be afforded. That would be denying to these children the rights and privileges to which they were entitled. He did not wish to make this a controversial point. He wished hon. Gentlemen would ask themselves, on this clause still more than on Clause 4, whether they wished these facilities to be afforded. They were facilities of a most limited description. The Government had been invited to extend them, but had rejected the voice of the tempter, and had limited this to Clause 3. By this clause, all children whose parents wished them to be taught the religion of the denomination to which the school belonged should have it on not more than two mornings a week. That was pre-eminently a matter for arrangement between the owners and the authorities when they took over the school. It was only fair that it should be understood that these facilities were to be allowed if the parents wished it, and if the size of the school rendered it impossible that all the children should receive that denominational teaching on the same two mornings they were not thereby to be deprived of having it. For Heaven's sake let hon. Members make no mistake about this matter, which really was not open to the consequences anticipated by the last speech.

MR. J. W. WILSON said that after what had taken place he thought he had better ask leave to withdraw his Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: Is it your pleasure that the Amendment be withdrawn? [Loud cries of "No."]

MR. STUART WORTLEY said that as one of those who had said "no" when the proposal was put that the Amendment should be withdrawn he wished to explain why he had taken that course. He thought it was obvious that this limit of two days was perfectly mischievous and would take away from the local authority the freedom and liberty which the Government proclaimed as the keynote of their policy. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would extend the liberty to be given in regard to the time of religious instruction and would see that by making this small concession he would get rid of a large portion of the ill-will engendered by the Bill.

Mr. SOARES (Devonshire, Barnstaple) said he was strongly in favour of the facilities given by the Bill under Clauses 3 and 4, but he was not in favour of them as interpreted by the right hon. Gentleman. The point he wanted to make clear was what was going to happen to the rural schools, because he represented a rural constituency. Was there to be a right of entry on the part of every single teacher of every denomination to give denominational teaching on every day of the week? If the public were going to pay for the teaching of denominational religion on five days a week, which was the only interpretation he could put upon the declarations of the right hon. Gentleman, he could not support the facilities. He hoped, however, that the right hon. Gentleman would say that his interpretation was a wrong one.

Mr. BIRRELL said that it was entirely a question of honestly giving effect to these facilities. If it were not necessary to allow the clergyman a right of entry on every day in the week it certainly would not be allowed. It was a matter of machinery. In the great majority of the rural schools there would be no difficulty in confining this "facilities" teaching to two named days in the week; but if it could not be given reasonably and properly on two days the time would have to be extended.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said that he agreed that it was a matter of machinery. But it rested with the denominational teachers, and with them alone, to determine the matter. ["No."] This was not to be a matter of arrangement, or one of the points to be bargained about between the managers and the local authorities. It rested with the denomination alone to determine how the teaching was to be given—["No"]—whether the two days teaching to be given to each child should be concentrated into two days of the week, or whether it should be distributed over five days of the week, although no single child might receive it on more than two days of the week. ["No."] That was what they contemplated in the Bill, and that was what they approved of.

Mr. BIRRELL: I do not agree at all. The right hon. Gentleman's interpretation comes to this, that if the denomination chooses to say they cannot teach twenty, thirty, forty, or fifty children on two days they are to be entitled to come in on every day. That I entirely dispute. It is a matter of machinery and a matter for the local authority.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: The local authority? On what words in the clause does the right hon. Gentleman rely for an interpretation which is not the interpretation he gave ten minutes ago, and is absolutely inconsistent with the plain meaning of the English language?

Mr. DILLON said he only rose for the purpose of pointing out that it must now have dawned on the minds of some hon. Gentlemen opposite that the time allocated to Clauses 3 and 4 was not quite sufficient.

SIR W. ROBSON said one was disposed to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition where in the clause he found the words empowering the denominational teachers, without any reference to the local authority, to impose its own idea of the number of days necessary to comply with the provisions of the clause. The clause said the local authorities should afford facilities to enable children to receive, on not more than two days a week, the religious instruction they required. The denomination was not entitled to select and classify the children themselves, whether the local authority liked it or not, so as to spread the denominational instruction over five days. He reminded the Committee, moreover, that the clause was founded on the experience of existing schools. In schools as they now existed it had been found in general sufficient to give the Catechism teaching on two mornings in the week, and that covered all the children in the school.

LORD R. CECIL confessed that he was utterly unable to accept the Solicitor-General's explanation, and regarded the construction put upon the clause by the Solicitor-General as involving a serious infringement of the liberty of the subject. The net result of the interpretation of the Solicitor-General was that a local authority which was hostile to the giving of religious instruction would be able to insist upon what instruction should be given.

MR. PAUL advised the President to drop a clause which nobody understood, nobody supported, and to which everybody objected.

*MR. LEIF JONES thought it was a revelation to both sides of the House that the interpretation suggested by the right hon. Gentleman opposite could be put upon this clause. He could only say that if that was the interpretation to which his right hon. friend intended to give effect he must alter the clause by omitting the words "on not more than two days a week." He defied anyone to say, if religious teaching went on five days a week, that the Bill did not "enable" the children to receive religious teaching on those five days.

MR. BIRRELL said that if the clause meant what the right hon. Gentleman opposite thought it meant, he wanted it made perfectly clear that it did not mean that. It did mean what he had already indicated, but he would take care on Report that the interpretation put upon the clause by the right hon. Gentleman was impossible.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: To what speech of the right hon. Gentleman is he going to make his Bill conform? I am in the recollection of the whole House when I say that the interpretation which in unmistakable language I put on the clause was endorsed by the Minister in charge.

And, it being half-past Ten of the Clock, the Chairman proceeded, pursuant to the Order of the House of the 18th June, to put forthwith the Question on the Amendment already proposed from the Chair.

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 352; Noes, 159. (Division List No. 142.)

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Rawlinson, and Mr. Evelyn Cecil.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS, on a point of order, said that one of the tellers in the last division, the hon. Member for Aston Manor failed for several minutes to proceed to the door of the lobby, and hon. Members were kept waiting. That meant that the division was lengthened very much, and he wished to know if that did not constitute a disobedience of the rules of the House, which laid down that a teller should proceed at once to the lobby.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY asked if there was any rule of the House under which the tellers had to proceed to the door in order to conduct the division under the new system.

THE CHAIRMAN: In reply to the last question, I do not think that there is any order to that effect. What occurred in this case was that there was some little misunderstanding as to the tellers, and the consequence was that one of the tellers for some time did not go to the door, but he eventually went to the door.

The CHAIRMAN thereupon proceeded to put forthwith the question, "That the clause stand part of the Bill."

Question agreed to.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. GEORGE WHITELEY, Yorkshire, W.R., Pudsey): I move that you, Mr. Chairman, do now report Progress.

SIR E. CARSON: May I ask why we should report Progress?

MR. GEORGE WHITELEY said he was quite willing to withdraw the Motion if the Opposition desired to proceed now with Clause 4.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member withdraw the Motion?

FINANCE BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the day for Second Reading read.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2ª.—(The Marquess of Ripon.)

*VISCOUNT ST. ALDWYN: My Lords, it is not my intention to detain your Lordships at any length with observations upon the Second Reading of this Bill, because in the first place, I am cognisant of the constitutional limitations which govern our action in this matter, and in the second place, I have no desire whatever to oppose the Second Reading of the Budget Bill of the year. It was admitted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in introducing the Budget that it was in the nature of a provisional financial arrangement, and that we must wait until next year for the complete financial policy of His Majesty's Government. That was a very proper and natural suggestion, and I do not in the least complain of it; but precisely on that account I desire to make some observations on one particular point of the financial arrangements of the country—namely, the present position of the income-tax.

The estimated product of the income-tax for the present year is £31,250,000, at the rate of a shilling in the pound. The Chancellor of the Exchequer made some very forcible and true observations on the present position of the income-tax. He said—

> "An income-tax at a uniform rate of a shilling in the pound in time of peace is impossible to justify and difficult to defend. It is a burden upon the trade of the country, which, in the long run, affects not only profits but wages; and it presses with extreme and peculiar severity on that large class of the community with incomes from £700 to £2,000 a year, who pay it in addition to their full share of taxation on articles of consumption; and it tends to destroy, or, at any rate, to contract a most readily available reserve on which the State can draw in a sudden and unforeseen emergency."

I wish entirely to associate myself with those sentiments. When I had the honour to be Chancellor of the Exchequer I did my best to carry out those views. When at the commencement of the South African war, I had to look about for increased sources of taxation, besides increasing the income-tax, and besides adding to the indirect taxation upon alcohol, tea, and tobacco, I induced Parliament to assent to three new and important indirect taxes—the duties on sugar, corn and coal. Thus I endeavoured to divide fairly the cost of the war between the comparatively small class of the community liable to direct taxation through the income-tax, and the people as a whole. But I find no attempt whatever on the part of the present Government to carry into effect the wholesome doctrine laid down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in regard to the income-tax.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that to reduce the income-tax by a penny would cost him £2,600,000, and that the means at his disposal were insufficient for the purpose. The right hon. Gentleman budgeted for a surplus of £3,074,000; and in my belief it would have been perfectly possible for him, even if he had considered it necessary, as he did consider it necessary, to add £500,000 to the unprecedented amount which this year will go to the repayment of debt, to reduce the income-tax by a penny, because the loss to the revenue by such a reduction would not amount in the first year to the total yield of a penny in one year. But instead of reducing the income-tax, the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to reduce the tea duty by a penny in the pound, and to abolish the coal tax as from November 1st. As to reduction of the tea duty, I would only say that no one for many years has touched the tea duty by less than twopence in the pound, and for the simple reason that the poor consumers of tea, upon whom the tea duty falls infinitely more heavily than upon the larger consumers, are only able to buy their tea in such small quantities that a reduction by a penny can hardly by any possibility reach them.

As to the coal duty, I have never argued that it was free from objections. Every tax has its objections; and there were objections, not merely theoretical, to imposing an export duty on any article of production in this country. But the result of the coal duty has not been what its most vigorous opponents prophesied at the time of its imposition. They said that the imposition of 1s. duty would lead to the closing of mines in this country, and would practically lead to many ships being deprived of outward cargoes altogether, and therefore being laid up. The picture drawn of the terrible state to which some parts of England and Scotland would be reduced owing to the imposition of the coal duty was a very lurid one indeed. But what has happened? There has been, I believe, and I think it fair to state it, some reduction in our exports of medium quality coal to the markets of North Europe; but, with regard to our general export of coal, that has continued to increase since the imposition of the duty, though not at so great a rate as before.

Considering that the duty produced £2,000,000 a year, and that the effects of it did not bear out the prophecies that had been made, I must say I believe it would be extremely difficult for any Chancellor of the Exchequer to discover any indirect tax which would produce more to the revenue at less cost to the industry of this country. But that is not all. In some respects the repeal of that duty will be a loss to this country. An instance has come to my knowledge in which a London company, which has to purchase large quantities of Welsh smokeless coal, directly the announcement of the repeal of the coal duty was made had notice from the contractors that in any renewed contract a shilling a ton more would be charged for the coal. And why? Because the contractors expected that by the repeal of this tax the foreign demand for this class of coal would be so much increased that the price might be safely raised to the home consumers.

I am old fashioned enough, in spite of the Report of the Royal Commission on Coal Supplies, to believe that it is not to the interest of this country to encourage the export of smokeless Welsh coal, which is of such enormous value to the Navy as well as to the industry of this country. But I entirely admit that both in this matter and in the reduction of the tea duty the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer commended themselves generally to the House of Commons. It is possible that if instead of making these proposals the Chancellor of the Exchequer had proposed to reduce the income-tax, he would not have had the assent of the present House of Commons. But the important point is this—that having £3,000,000 to deal with, and being able thereby to reduce a shilling income-tax by a penny, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has found it necessary instead to reduce taxation on tea and coal, which I think no one can say pressed really hardly on the people.

What sort of hope does that give to the income-tax payer, to whose condition the Chancellor of the Exchequer referred with so much sympathy, of any reduction on the present rate at any future time? Of course, it may be said that it is hoped by His Majesty's present Government that there will be a material reduction in the expenditure of the country in future years. I can conceive one quarter in which there might be a considerable reduction. The Chancellor of the Exchequer quoted some remarkable figures in his Budget speech with respect to the increase in recent years of the cost of the Army and Navy. I will quote them again, as I believe that the attention of the country cannot be too much directed to the remarkable nature of these figures. The right hon. Gentleman said that in the year 1896–97 the Army, the numbers of which were voted at 156,000 men, cost £18,270,000 in the Estimates, whereas in 1906–7 the numbers of men voted were 204,000 and the cost £29,800,000 showing an increase of 30 per cent. in the men and of 63 per cent. in their cost. Those are very remarkable figures, and they are even more remarkable when compared with the Navy. The numbers of men voted for the Navy in this year, as compared with 1896–97, have increased by 41 per cent., but the cost has only increased 43 per cent. Does not that give us—I am bound to say it gives me—a prima facie ground for believing that there must be great waste in our Army expenditure, which is susceptible of material reduction without loss to the efficiency of our Army?

But what is there to be said on the other side? Supposing His Majesty's present Government are able materially to reduce the Army Estimates without injuring the efficiency of the Army, there must certainly in the future be an increase under the head of works both in the Army and in the Navy Estimates if they carry out the policy which they have declared, and on which, I hope I may add without offence, they are very much disposed to plume themselves. In 1895 Lord Rosebery's Government initiated the policy of providing for the charges of military and naval works by a system of loans for a term not exceeding thirty years. That policy was continued by the late Government, and the total addition to the debt incurred by that policy is considerable. But the policy was necessary. Necessary works had been allowed to fall behind through mistaken ideas of economy, and the increase in the size of our ships, the increase in the number of soldiers and sailors, necessitated exceptional expenditure in providing new dockyards in different parts of the world, in barracks, hospitals, training grounds for soldiers, and in permanent works, which in our judgment was more fairly spread over a period of thirty years than imposed on the taxpayers of the present day. There is no doubt that the system has its faults, for probably there have been instances in which it led to unnecessary expenditure on ill-considered schemes and money has been wasted in that way. But if you abandon it there is this danger on the other side, that for the sake of economy and in order to diminish the Army and Navy Estimates of the year, the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day will reduce the item of works in his Estimates to a point which is inconsistent with the efficient maintenance of the Army and Navy. That was done in previous years, and I hope that it will not be done again. But if it is not done, the item of Works in the Army and Navy Estimates will show a considerable increase in future years.

But can anyone who has watched the action of the House of Commons throughout this session believe that it will be possible for any Government, however strong their desire for economy, to make any very great reduction in the expenditure of the country? Resolutions have been passed one after another in the present House of Commons in favour of adding largely to the expenditure on elementary education, which has already increased 60 per cent. in the last ten years, by providing meals for hungry children; in favour of imposing the cost of elections on the public, of providing payment for Members of Parliament; of providing employment for those who call themselves "unemployed;" of providing better housing accommodation for the poor; and finally of giving pensions to all persons indiscriminately over the age of sixty-five; and also there is a constant pressure on the Government largely to increase the pay and other advantages enjoyed by those who are employed in the public service.

All these proposals together would involve an enormous increase in expenditure. How have they been met by the Chancellor of the Exchequer? They have been met with great sympathy, with speeches to the effect that he would be glad to accede to the demands, but he had no money. But what is the first thing that the Chancellor of the Exchequer does? Having a surplus of £3,000,000, he abolishes an equivalent amount of taxation. I wish to credit the House of Commons and the Government in accepting resolutions of this kind with a sincere desire to carry them out, but this desire is surely somewhat inconsistent with the repeal of £3,000,000 a year of taxation, which, as far as I know, has not pressed with any real hardship on any one. I am confident, however, that this plea of there being no money will not last much longer, and that when the Gentlemen who are in favour of this increase of expenditure make these proposals again they will not be satisfied with such an answer, but will require that means shall in some way or other be provided by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to meet them. Well, my Lords, what does this mean? Is there any form of indirect taxation to which a Chancellor of the Exchequer, representing the present Government, could resort with a view to adding to the revenue of the country and in order to provide for the increase in expenditure suggested? Of course, His Majesty's present Government cannot adopt the proposals of the Tariff Reform League for levying duties on all manufactured and partly manufactured imported goods. I should entirely agree with them in objecting to any such proposals, because I believe that any reasonable study of the past would show that the result of duties of the kind would be infinitely more injurious to the trade and industry of the country than it would be beneficial in the majority of cases to the Exchequer. His Majesty's Government are debarred by their own opinions from any course of that sort. They have repealed the taxes to which I have referred. Is there any other indirect tax which it is possible for them to impose in their place. I do not believe that there is one. This means, therefore, that the present expenditure of the country, and any increase of expenditure that may be required on account of what I have mentioned, will have to be provided by the direct taxpayer—in other words, by the payers of the income-tax.

I may be told that a Committee has been appointed by the House of Commons to inquire into the present incidence of the income-tax, and whether it is possible to introduce any graduated system by which it would press less severely on smaller incomes—I suppose between £700 and £2,000 a year—and more upon the wealthier classes. Personally I am glad that the inquiry has been instituted. I have no objection on principle to graduation. We have accepted it in this country for many years in the house duty, and more lately in the estate duty. But I believe that the practicability of increasing the revenue by graduating the income-tax is a very doubtful matter indeed. I do not know how it can be done unless you are to single out through the officials of the Inland Revenue persons who might be suspected of having more than the limit of income above which you propose to impose a higher rate of taxation, require them to return the total amount of their income, and levy an additional income-tax upon them. I am sure that nobody who has the least acquaintance with the working of the income-tax would desire to see its mainstay removed—namely, the payment of the income-tax at its source. Supposing that such an additional tax were levied, there would be even a greater inducement than now exists, in schedule D of the income-tax, to make an incorrect statement of the total income. There would be, I believe, so many cases of incorrect statements of the kind on the part of persons who might be liable to the additional tax that its yield would be very small, and the Exchequer would run the risk of a very grave loss on the existing sources of revenue, because many taxpayers, thinking an additional tax unjust, would endeavour to avail themselves of all kinds of means to receive, in a way that the Inland Revenue could not ascertain, incomes from foreign dividends or foreign business, and matters of that kind, incomes which are now paid through bankers in London who deduct the income-tax before the dividends or profits are paid. I do not anticipate, therefore, that, even supposing this Committee should report that it would be possible in some way or other to graduate the income-tax and that the Government should adopt some proposal of the kind next year, the increase of the yield on the present income-tax would come to any very large amount.

I have been referring to the matter merely so far as it affects the burden on the income-tax payers in time of peace; but I believe there is a more serious and a more important side to the question, as it affects the resources of the country in time of war. When I was Chancellor of the Exchequer, during the South African war I had to raise a large increase of revenue to provide for the war charges. I turned, like all my predecessors, in the first place to the income-tax, which at the beginning of the war, stood at 8d. in the £. I raised it until in one year it reached 1s. 3d. in the £. But the income-tax now stands at 1s. in the £. Supposing it unfortunately happened that next year we were involved—and nobody can tell when this may happen—in some serious and costly war, the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day would start with an income-tax of 1s. in the £. He would be deprived of no less than £10,000,000 a year which was available to me for war purposes, and which is now being dissipated in time of peace.

I wish I could impress sufficiently on the House and on His Majesty's Government how seriously I regard this diminution of the necessary resources of the country in the event of a possible war. You may invent, as I had to invent, other kinds of taxation, but there is no tax which is so essentially useful in time of war as the income-tax. There is no other conceivable tax which can be raised and which can be lowered again without the smallest injurious effect on trade, commerce, and industry; and looking to the financial condition of the country, anything which deprives us of the full yield of that tax for meeting the cost of war is to my mind a very serious financial danger.

I thank your Lordships for the patience with which you have listened to my observations. I will conclude by saying that I make these criticisms in no hostile spirit to the Budget of this year or to His Majesty's Government. What I do desire is that in that large consideration which they have promised of the finances of the country this important fact should not be lost sight of—that an income-tax of 1s. in the £ is hard on the income-tax payers, most of whom are comparatively poor men, and in time of peace is utterly indefensible, as depriving us of necessary resources in time of war.

*LORD WELBY: My Lords, I have listened with very great attention to the speech that has just been delivered by the noble Viscount, and with a very large part of his observations, if I may venture to say so without presumption, I agree. I cannot help regretting, however, that the noble Viscount devoted some part of his speech to a defence of the coal duty. The noble Viscount, when he was proposing the tax, guarded himself by saying that care must be taken in aiming at revenue not to sacrifice trade. I cannot help thinking that the experience we have had of the working of the coal tax shows that we have endangered trade in seeking revenue from that source.

It appears to me that a duty of this kind must have one of two results—either it must add to the price and so far handicap the English trader, who is exposed to very great competition both from Germany and America, or it must diminish the productiveness of the trade, and to that extent diminish the fund from which the wages of the labourers employed are met. I lay stress upon this last point because of the very large proportion labour occupies in the cost of the production of a ton of coal. It is, I believe, admitted that the labour involved in the production of a ton of coal represents 80 per cent. of the whole cost. If that is the case, it appears to me that the imposition of any duty which has the effect of restricting either the export of our coal or the output, and thereby diminishing the labour employed, is a very serious matter, and I venture to think that the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, in seeking revenue, to a great extent endangered trade. I gathered that the noble Viscount did not object very greatly to the course that has been taken. Indeed, it would be somewhat hard for noble Lords opposite to do so seeing that the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the late Government had announced his intention of giving up this duty. On both sides of politics this duty was regarded as one of the first to be surrendered.

I have much sympathy with the noble Viscount when he speaks of the difficult position in which we stand with regard to taxation. I hope that before any preconceived doctrine is laid down that direct taxation has a prior claim upon the Government, care will be be taken to review the whole position of the taxpayer. I am constantly struck with the fact that an enormous amount of property is in the hands of a very small number of people. For instance, if we look at the Inland Revenue returns we see that something like 4,000 people in a short time died leaving £300,000,000 of property. Taking into consideration the deductions which are now made from the lower incomes, has a case been made out for a reduction of income-tax in preference to a reduction on those articles of consumption the tax on which weighs so heavily on the wage-earning classes?

I do not wish to offer any criticism upon the action taken this year by His Majesty's Government. It is clear that it would be impossible for a Government coming into power in the month of December to effect any great change in our financial system in their first year. The difficulty of ascertaining the real facts of the financial situation is at once a bar to any effective action being taken by a Government in the first year. If I might express a pious opinion, I should have been very glad if His Majesty's Government had seen their way not to reduce taxation this year, but to devote the money which they would then have had in hand to the reduction of debt, so that next year, when they had thoroughly studied the financial situation, they might have been in a stronger position to carry out important financial reforms. I remember that, in the year 1873, Mr Gladstone devoted a large surplus to paying off the Alabama debt instead of reducing taxation, and thereby he secured in the following year a revenue which gave an opportunity, which I suppose has never since been enjoyed by a Chancellor of the Exchequer, of carrying out large and important financial reforms on a scale in ordinary years impossible. But in the case of a new Government having just taken office, I quite admit that that is a policy which they could hardly be expected to follow. I think by next year the Government ought to have fully considered the situation and be in a position to give effect to some of the large financial measures which are before the country.

I remember a conversation I once had with the late Lord Northbrook, a statesman of very great practical knowledge and at the same time one of the most prudent financiers. From his long experience at the War Office and the Admiralty, Lord Northbrook had a full sense of our responsibilities in the matter of defence, and his general training led him to know how dangerous it was to diminish or endanger our resources in time of war. He told me that he had before him at one time several recommendations from his expert advisers regarding fortification in India. He told me that the demand was large, and he referred it back to them in order that they might endeavour to reduce it and bring it more within the limits which he thought they could afford. They were not able to present a result such as he desired, and he then said that he could not agree to it. In a question of this kind there were, he pointed out, two dangers—the danger of not being provided with a sufficient military force, and the greater danger of putting the finances of India out of gear; and for the moment he felt that he must give the preference to establishing and maintaining a sound financial condition in India. I was very much struck by the manner in which he told me that, and I think it is important that this should be borne in mind in dealing with this question. I venture to hope that His Majesty's Government will accept the canon which Lord Northbrook then laid down.

The noble Viscount referred to the position in which we were in 1899. In the whole course of our experience there has hardly been a more favourable year, financially speaking, then 1899. For years we had been reducing the taxation of the country. We had also been reducing the Debt, and our Consols stood higher than ever before. Not only had the Debt been very largely decreased in consequence of the action of Chancellors of the Exchequer of both Parties, but owing to one of the most difficult and at the same time successful measures which I remember during my career at the Treasury—namely, the conversion of the Debt by my noble friend Lord Goschen—the charge of the Debt had immensely decreased. Never before in our history were we in such a favourable position to face the heavy cost of war as in 1899, owing to the wise finance of both Parties in the State for many years previously.

What is the position in which we find ourselves at the present moment? The reduction of the Debt, which had amounted to £150,000,000 in the space of thirty years, has been obliterated, and our Debt stands now at a higher figure than, or at as high a figure as, it has stood since since 1870. The sum of £23,000,000 has been added to our taxation, and on every side we see symptoms of excessive expenditure. One result has been that whereas in 1899 Consols stood at 110, or, perhaps at 109, allowing for the fact that Consols were bearing for a year or two a quarter per cent. additional interest, they are now at eighty-nine or ninety.

The country possesses two great instruments for employment in the case of such an emergency as war. The first is its defensive forces, and the second its financial position. It is difficult, in my opinion, to say which is the more important. But I am afraid that should the emergency of war now arise the country would not be able to start from the sound condition of finance from which it was able to start at the outbreak of the South African war. The position is therefore a very grave one, and I hope that during the present year His Majesty's Government will be able to give such consideration to the national finances as will restore them to a sound basis. In this connection I would again quote the late Lord Northbrook, who declared that if he must run some risk he would rather run the risk of not accepting some of the recommendations of his expert advisers than endanger the stability of Indian finance. It ought to be the canon of every Chancellor of the Exchequer that under no circumstances will he endanger the stability of English finances.

The noble Viscount held out very little hope of reduction of expenditure in the future. Indeed, he apprehended rather an increase. If the House of Commons is bent not only on maintaining the present scale of expenditure but on listening to every demand that is made upon it for fresh expenditure, I fear that the present unsound condition of the national finances will not be removed, and that if the present strain is long continued the country will be in a most unfavourable position to meet an emergency.

*VISCOUNT GOSCHEN: My Lords, I shall trouble your Lordships with only a few observations. I can associate myself entirely with the principles laid down by my noble friend Lord St. Aldwyn, and I think that he has rendered a great service by placing before your Lordships his review of the financial situation. There is one remark which I would like to add in consequence of what has just fallen from my noble friend Lord Welby. The noble Lord quoted, naturally with admiration and approval, the doctrines laid down by Lord Northbrook, but I venture to think that such a question cannot be decided by any general principle. It must depend entirely upon the circumstances of each successive phase of European and other politics.

If there arose an emergency in which the country were called upon to act suddenly, there might be a frightful disaster if we were not prepared sufficiently with our naval and military defences, and certainly it would be a greater disaster than a disarrangement of our finances. It is essential, therefore, to look around, to consider the risks, in order to judge of the present necessity for preparedness. If there is one fact that must be borne in mind, a fact of supreme importance, it is that in the most modern wars they who strike first and hardest are most likely to win. I agree with Lord St. Aldwyn that there may possibly be room for considerable reduction in the Army expenditure, though I cannot form a judgment upon it, because my experience of the Navy shows how exceedingly difficult it is for those who are not acquainted with the inner working of the establishment to judge upon general principles as to whether there is extravagance or not.

But with regard to the Navy, you must take into consideration the new developments of foreign navies. Navies have been developed by three nations which before counted far less in any review of naval power. Therefore the public ought not to take it for granted that because the present cost of the Navy is much larger than it was ten years ago, there is now an opportunity for reduction in naval expenditure. The Chancellor of the Exchequer in his able speech in the other House quoted comparative figures in relation to the increase in expenditure and said, "These facts speak for themselves." That is just what they do not do. The facts do not speak for themselves. If a battleship that formerly cost £750,000 now costs £1,500,000, it is idle to charge the Admiralty with extravagance because they have spent £500,000 more upon the battleship. The additional £500,000 spent on the ship is now absolutely necessary.

I think the public will delude itself, and the Radical Party will delude itself, if it thinks the Navy offers any wide scope for economy in the coming years. Those who have read the political programme of other countries this year must see that we live in times when a reduction in our defensive forces would be one of the greatest mistakes of which the country could be guilty. I therefore offer these few words, not of warning, but of caution, that the hopes of those who so much desire a reduction in expenditure are, so far as the Navy is concerned, doomed to disappointment.

LORD JOICEY: My Lords, I have some hesitation in intervening in this debate after the speeches to which we have listened from noble Lords who are recognised throughout the country as great financial experts. But, though I have not had the experience that the noble Lords who have spoken enjoy, I have been largely concerned in great financial operations of different kinds. I cannot agree with the noble Viscount who spoke first that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was wrong in remitting the coal duty. My views are pretty well known on that subject, and I have as large an experience of the effect of that duty upon the general trade of the country as anyone. Your Lordships must not forget that this question was gone into very carefully by a Commission appointed by the late Government, and that that Commission decided clearly and distinctly that the duty was a very serious injury to the trade of the country and ought to be abolished at the first opportunity.

*VISCOUNT ST. ALDWYN: Will the noble Lord quote the words of the Report? I do not recollect that.

LORD JOICEY: I cannot quote the words, but that was the spirit of the whole Report. I know that many people are under the impression that the coal duty was not paid by this country, but by the consumers of coal abroad. But as the frontier that was taxed was the frontier between this country and the foreign consumer only, and all other countries which produced coal were open without the tax, it was quite impossible to make the consumer pay the tax. I have been asked more than once how it was that the consumer in this country paid the tea duty, and yet the consumer abroad did not pay the coal duty. Surely the answer to that is obvious. If a tax were put upon tea coming into this country by the east coast, and the whole of the west coast were left entirely free from duty, could anyone argue for a moment that the tax would be paid by the consumer?

The coal tax has now gone. It was based, in my judgment, on a wrong principle. I do not believe in any export tax. I think it is always in restraint of trade, and I hope this country will never again be so foolish as to put a tax on anything exported from this country. I am bound to say that with much that fell from the noble Viscount I entirely agree. The great increase in the expenditure of this country got its impetus during the South African War, and we are now feeling the effects of that enormous expenditure, and it will be many years before we shall be able to relieve ourselves from them. I agree with the noble Viscount that the income-tax is a great advantage in time of war. It is a tax which can be very easily levied and collected, and a huge sum can be secured in that way in a very short time. But I cannot take quite the same alarming view as the noble Viscount. While our taxation in this country is increasing to a serious extent our wealth and our population are increasing certainly at the same ratio, and I do not think, therefore, that we need be unnecessarily alarmed, even if the income-tax should stand at 1s. in the £.

What may take place after the Committee which has been appointed by the present Government to deal with this question has reported I am unable to say. At the same time, I do not think it will be any serious burden upon people who have large incomes if they have to pay a larger proportion to the Exchequer than they are paying at the present time. I do not think that there are any men with huge incomes who would not willingly pay at all events their fair share to maintain the services of the country. With regard to the Navy and Army, there is no doubt that the country fully believes in their being kept up to the highest point of efficiency. So far as I have been able to gather the feeling of the country, I have never found a man, I have certainly never found any body of men, in favour of reducing the efficiency of the Navy. With regard to the allusion made by the noble Viscount opposite to the desire of certain Radicals to get the expenditure on the Navy reduced, I am bound to say that so far as I have had experience of the working classes, in particular in the north of England, I have always found them thoroughly in favour of maintaining the Navy at the highest point of efficiency, and if further money should be required for that purpose I think it would be forthcoming, and would be given freely by the country if the Government could show that it was absolutely necessary.

As to the Army, certain promises have been held out of a reduction of expenditure. I think it quite possible that there may be means of reducing expenditure on the Army without impairing its efficiency; but if any reduction should be proposed which, in my judgment, would interfere with the efficiency of the Army, I should certainly feel it my duty to oppose it, because I think the vast interests we have to protect demand that we should have both services as efficient as they can be rendered. I congratulate the Government on having got their Budget through without any serious opposition in another place, and I account for it to a large extent by the fact that, as has been stated, this is the Budget of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer. Surely, if it were his own child he could not very well disown and attack it. When the present Chancellor of the Exchequer comes to deal with the financial affairs of the country we shall probably see great changes, and I hope they will be such changes as will conduce to the raising of money easily for the services of the country.

*THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (The MARQUESS of RIPON): My Lords, we have had a very important and interesting discussion, and those who have addressed your Lordships have spoken from various points of view, and with great authority. We all listened, I am sure, with interest to the speech of the noble Viscount opposite, Lord St. Aldwyn, who gave us the result of his long experience. I am not able to agree with all the conclusions at which the noble Viscount arrived, but at the same time every one in this House will recognise that he spoke only from the results of his own experience, which is so great and to which we owe so much respect, and that he did not do so from any Party considerations whatever.

There was a great deal which fell from the noble Viscount with respect to the income-tax with which I imagine most of us will agree, and it is well that he should have availed himself of this opportunity to call attention to the value and importance of the income-tax and to its special position in our system of finance. But, my Lords, I do not think that it would have been possible for my right hon. friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to have based his financial arrangements this year solely upon a reduction of the income-tax. I do not know where he was to have found the means of doing anything else if he had taken a penny off the income-tax. The noble Viscount made a slight error, I think, in the figures he quoted. He spoke of my right hon. friend as having budgeted for a surplus of £3,704,000.

*VISCOUNT ST. ALDWYN: No, £3,074,000.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: Then I did not hear the noble Viscount correctly.

*VISCOUNT ST. ALDWYN: A reduction of the income-tax would have been possible, but no other taxes could have been reduced.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: I do not think that was a possible course for my right hon. friend to have taken. As the noble Viscount knows, very important questions connected with the structure and the mode of raising the income-tax are now under consideration. Those questions have been referred to a Committee. They cover a very wide range. They relate to that difficult question of graduation to which the noble Viscount alluded. They relate also to the problem of the difference between permanent and temporary incomes, a question which I remember was settled in the year 1853 for at least a generation by the great speech of Mr. Gladstone, one of the most remarkable efforts that was ever made by any Chancellor of the Exchequer in the House of Commons. Those questions are under consideration. I do not put that forward as a conclusive reason, but I think it is a reason of considerable weight, against having made a reduction of the income-tax the sole financial arrangement of the year.

The noble Viscount touched upon the question of the coal tax, but I do not propose to delay your Lordships long upon that matter. The noble Lords behind me who have spoken have touched upon some of the objections which can be raised to that tax. I venture to think it has not been a successful tax. The noble Viscount seemed to think that the quotation given by my noble friend behind me from the Report of the Royal Commission on Coal Supplies was incorrect. In one respect I must admit that it was, inasmuch as the Report of the Commission contains the facts which were collected and the results at which they arrived, but does not draw any conclusion. But, on the other hand, the Report tells us that the witnesses generally were of opinion that the maintenance of a large coal export trade is of supreme importance to the country and essential to the prosperity of the coal-producing districts. On page 23 of the Report it is stated that—

> "It is difficult to resist the contention that the tax had some effect in reducing the tonnage exported in the year 1901, although it is probable that the high level of prices, which was still maintained, and the declining condition of trade, both at home and abroad, had some influence on the figures. It will be seen that the total output of coal in 1901 in the United Kingdom was less by 6,000,000 tons than in 1900, but it should be noted that the home consumption in 1901 was 5,500,000 tons less than it was in 1900. It should not be overlooked that the coal-exporter has had the advantage of much lower export freights for coal in 1901 and subsequently than prevailed in 1900, and this must have mitigated the effect of the tax to a large extent."

All this tends to show, together with other portions of the Report, that the tax has interfered with trade, and I venture to think there is clear evidence in this Report that it has hampered the operation of our trade in France, Belgium, and Holland, and that in those countries German coal has had a tendency to take the place of British coal. From the facts contained in the Report we find that wages and profits have had a tendency to decline. I think these are good grounds for repealing the tax. Certainly we know that it was the intended policy of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer to repeal the coal tax. Therefore, my right hon. friend cannot be charged with taking a step the necessity of which had not already forced itself upon the minds of those who at the time were responsible for the finances of the country. I need not dwell on that subject. All I say is, that as far as the facts are known to me, I believe the coal tax to have acted in a manner injurious and hampering to our interests, and I think it was one of the first taxes marked for repeal.

The noble Viscount seems very much afraid of what may be done by the House of Commons in regard to the increase of taxes. That is a complaint which ever since I first entered Parliament I have heard made by every Chancellor of the Exchequer and ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer, and there have been but few men who have stood up to demands of that kind in the way in which Mr. Gladstone did. I quite admit that each demand for money for this purpose or for that must be considered not only upon its abstract merits but in connection with the financial condition of the country, and I am quite sure that that is the course which my right hon. friend will take. Large reductions of expenditure, if they are made, must be made upon the large items, while at the same time a careful Chancellor of the Exchequer would always keep his eye upon small items also. The noble Viscount pointed out with great force the startling difference between the rate of expenditure on the Army and the rate on the Navy. I agree with the noble Viscount in thinking that that is a fact which needs most careful consideration, and it is receiving that consideration from His Majesty's Government.

Your Lordships are aware, from what has been said before in this House, that the Secretary of State for War is considering the whole of our military arrangements very carefully and deliberately. I do not think your Lordships will be inclined to condemn him for taking his time over that. We have had too many successive experiments made with the Army during the last few years, and it is very desirable that any further changes should be made with the utmost deliberation. I have every reason to believe that my right hon. friend Mr. Haldane will find it within his power to reduce the Army expenditure in an effective manner, although it is not possible for me at the present moment to make any statement upon that subject. I believe it is probable that an opportunity will be taken by the Secretary of State to make some statement with regard to it in some of the discussions on the Estimates before the end of the session.

I do not know that I need detain your Lordships longer. Unlike the noble Lords who have addressed you, I do not profess to be an expert on this subject.

I can only say, however, that I am unable to agree that the one thing to have done was to reduce the income tax. My noble friend Lord Welby seemed to think that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have done better if he had made no reduction of taxation at all. That, my Lords, is a counsel of perfection, and I do not think my noble friend himself believes that it would have been advisable or possible for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to have taken that course. Neither do I think that it would have been possible for him in the present state of public opinion, in the face of a Parliament like the present, to have reduced the income tax and nothing else. Therefore, he has dealt with two taxes—the coal tax, which was marked especially for removal, and the tea duty, the reduction of which will afford relief—limited relief, I agree—to the people of this country in one of the most important articles of consumption. The noble Viscount said he did not think that reduction would reach the people.

*VISCOUNT ST. ALDWYN: The poorest of the people.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: The information with which I have been furnished from the financial departments leads me to think that it has had that effect, if not always in the reduction in price, in some cases in the improvement of the quality. The statement made by the noble Viscount at the commencement of his speech really represents the truth of the present position. He said this was a provisional Budget. He accepted it as a provisional Budget. A provisional Budget it is. It is not to be taken as indicating what is likely to be the financial policy of His Majesty's Government in coming years. It is a provisional Budget dealing with the finances as they were left to us by our predecessors, dealing with the Estimates of expenditure which we received from them, and it is intended solely for the purpose of making such reduction—limited, I quite agree—in taxation as was possible in the circumstances in which we took office.

INDIAN RAILWAYS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

EARL BEAUCHAMP: My Lords, this is a small Departmental Bill about which I do not think there can be any controversy. The original Railways Act of 1894 enables the Indian railway companies, upon certain conditions, to pay interest on their share capital out of capital during construction. By Section 9 of that Act the duration of it extended only to December 31st, 1905, or to the end of the then next ensuing session of Parliament and no longer, unless Parliament should otherwise determine. It appears desirable to make this Act permanent, and the Bill now before your Lordships has been drawn up with that object. I beg to move that it be read a second time.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.—(Earl Beauchamp.)

On Question, Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

GREENWICH OBSERVATORY.

*LORD ELLENBOROUGH rose, in accordance with notice, to call attention to the electrical works that the London County Council have lately built about half a mile from the Royal Observatory at Greenwich, and to point out that the presumed position of every ship when at sea, and out of sight of land, is based upon a comparsion of the results of observations taken by her officers, and other observations taken years previously by astronomers at the Royal Observatory, and that the positions of all places shown on British and American maps and charts, whether European, Indian, or Colonial, and also on most foreign maps and charts, are also dependent upon observations taken at Greenwich; that at a conference of delegates from the principal countries in the world, twenty-seven in number, held at Washington in October, 1884, for the purpose of fixing on a meridian proper to be employed as a common zero of longitude, twenty-two representatives voted in favour of adopting the meridian passing through the centre of the transit instrument at the Observatory at Greenwich as the initial meridian for longitude, and that, in consequence of this, nearly all nations of importance now use Greenwich time as a Standard or Universal time; that if a single ship is lost in consequence of confusion being introduced into longitudes its value might well be treble that of these new electrical works; that during the last two hundred and thirty years many millions of observations connected with cartography and astronomy have been made at the Observatory and other places, the value of which largely depends upon the fixity of the Royal Observatory as a reference point; and to call attention to the action of the London County Council in building furnaces and tall chimneys nearly due north of the Observatory, and in using engines which cause some of the astronomical instruments to vibrate in such a manner as to destroy all possibility of accurate observation; and to ask the Government if they will apply to Parliament for power to prevent the Royal Observatory from being shaken or smoked out, either at present or any future time.

The noble Lord said: My Lords, if the London County Council, encouraged by the success of their line of river steamers, launch out into ocean traffic, they will soon learn from their sea-going captains that it will be necessary to supply their ships with chronometers, whose error on Greenwich mean time is always known. The first thing that a seaman has to do when he wishes to find his ship's position when out of sight of land is to take the angular height of one or more heavenly bodies with a sextant. The next thing he does is to find the time that it was at Greenwich when he took his observations. This is done by means of a chronometer. This process is called getting a Greenwich date. It is a preliminary to working almost every class of observation at sea, whether for the purpose of ascertaining the position of a ship or for finding the error of a compass.

When he has obtained his Greenwich date, he proceeds to calculate how far he is east or west of Greenwich and how far he is north or south of the equator. This he does by comparing the results of observations made years previously at Greenwich, with those he has just made himself. If he or Greenwich make a mistake the ship may be lost with all hands. If out of the whole of the commerce of the globe a single ship is lost, her value might well amount to three times that of the Greenwich electrical works, to say nothing of her crew, who, after all, count as something. The London County Council have as yet only put up 20,000 horse-power at Greenwich. Well, there are many ships afloat that carry more than that. In the Royal Navy alone there are more than twenty-five such ships.

In 1884 what had been the general practice was made the rule, and the meridian passing through the centre of the transit instrument at Greenwich was selected as the common zero of longitude for the whole world, and the centre of that instrument became the chief reference point in universal geography. The railways and telegraphs in America and many other countries are all dependent on Greenwich time. For instance, Inter-Colonial time, that is, Nova Scotia time, is four hours slow on Greenwich. Eastern time is five hours slow, Central time is six hours slow, Mountain time is seven hours slow, and Pacific time is eight hours slow on Greenwich. There is also Mid-Europe time, one hour fast, Eastern Europe, and South African time, two hours fast, and Australian, Japanese, and New Zealand time, all of which depend on Greenwich. If in obedience to the London County Council we change our point of reference, we shall have remonstrances and possibly demands for compensation from all parts of the globe. The position of every place in the world, of every lighthouse and of every rock, as depicted on an English or American map or chart, and on most foreign maps or charts, is known by the angle between the plane of its meridian and that of Greenwich.

It is somewhat difficult to explain to any one who has never studied any branch of science the value of the nearest obtainable exactitude in measurements. Nearly all the discoveries which make the progress of the world, in the application of which to various industries many millions of men find work who would otherwise be unemployed, have been due to experiments conducted with the greatest possible accuracy. More exact instruments for measuring weight and length are constantly being invented. The advance in our chemical, metallurgical, and electrical industries is largely due to their employment. In chemistry, when a substance is too small to be weighed, you dissolve it and see how much water its equivalent will discolour. All branches of science are more or less interlaced, and receive from time to time unexpected help from one another. Continuity of observation is also a matter of great importance. All large astronomical instruments take some years before they settle down to their work, and if the observatory was moved there would be a most regrettable gap.

I have been told that nearly £500,000 has been spent on these works by the London County Council. Even if this is the case, what is that in comparison with what has been spent in bygone years on surveys and scientific expeditions, and on other work more or less connected with Greenwich? What are the interests of a few thousand people living near Greenwich compared with those of the millions whose navigation, clocks, watches, and geography depend on Greenwich? The observatory was there first, and if people choose to come and live in its neighbourhood they must accept the few restrictions involved by such a residence. If they put up machinery it must be at the risk of being ordered to remove it. Perhaps business men may understand the matter better if put in this way. To move Greenwich Observatory for the sake of the London County Council engines would be like changing the value of the British pound sterling to that of the Egyptian pound for the convenience of a few Cairo financiers.

If it was necessary to erect engines at Greenwich, one would naturally ask, Why not put up turbines, which in all probability would cause no vibration at all? Failing them, why not put up triple expansion engines with horizontal cylinders, a pattern that has been in use for many years? They run very smoothly. Instead of that, double expansion engines were selected with the first cylinder placed perpendicularly above the crank so as to get as much thumping as possible. Is the astronomy and geography of the whole world to be put out of joint for the sake of the perpendicular cylinders of the London County Council? Their interests are infinitesimal compared with those they claim the right to interfere with. The Council must be made to grasp the fact that, omitting purely scientific considerations, the navigational, geographical and business interests of the world do not permit the removal of Greenwich Observatory, and that if anything has to go it is their works. But before going to the expense of removal, it would be well to consider the practicability of reducing the height of the chimneys by 100 feet, of introducing additional machinery for the consumption of smoke, using forced draught, of substituting turbines for reciprocating engines, and of adding many tons of concrete to the foundations. The latter method was successfully employed in reducing the vibration of some of the tube railways. Of course no further extension of the works should be allowed.

The London County Council chimneys are nearly due north of the Observatory. They extend to a height of 2½ degrees above the horizon of the Observatory, and the four chimneys together obscure a horizontal sky space of about 3½ degrees, thus excluding from all future observation a celestial space of about nine square degrees on the horizon. When smoke is coming out of the chimneys a still further space is obscured. At present only two chimneys are in use and the other two are approaching completion. The present plant of reciprocating engines can work up to 20,000 horse-power, though only 5,000 is in use at present.

It is impossible to estimate how much smoke and vibration there will be when the whole of this plant is in full working order, and how many instruments may then be disturbed.

If a clause is introduced into a private Act of Parliament it would give insufficient protection against future attacks by other persons. For instance, any company or person who chose to do so might build factories with still taller chimneys, and put up machinery, such as steam-hammers, which would shake the Observatory fifty times as much as the existing engines. I consider it absolutely necessary to pass a public Act of Parliament to protect the Royal Observatory from all future encroachments or interference. On March 13th, the London County Council actually wrote to the Astronomer Royal saying that they were—> "unable to acknowledge any liability in regard to the effect on the Observatory of the working of the station."

It is clear that the London County Council do not realise the mischief they are doing. It seems sad that the education of half a million of London children should have been entrusted to a body who are evidently ignorant of the first principles of geography. The London County Council are like little children playing with fire, and should be gently but firmly pulled off the hearth-rug—that is, the neighbourhood of Greenwich—before they have had time to do serious mischief.

I expect the next thing that the London County Council will do will be to order the Equator to clear out of the tropics and not to take more than its fair share of sunshine. A redistribution of sunshine would be a popular measure, but there might be some difficulty in carrying it out. Why not throw all the latitudes in the world out of order as well as the longitudes? As a matter of fact, the Poles and the Equator are not exactly always in the same position as regards the Earth. They oscillate to the extent of about fifty feet, while the Greenwich transit instrument remains the fixed reference point of the Universe. Another point on the same meridian would not serve the same purpose, with exactitude, as it might be more or less affected by this oscillation. When the London County Council engines are running, accurate observations for testing this oscillation cannot be taken. When I looked at the instrument used for measuring it, the lines in the mercurial mirror were constantly vibrating, though only 5,000 horse-power or less was being used. I was told that formerly they were only disturbed when trains were passing, but that now the movement is continuous. If ever the Greenwich railway directors ask for further Parliamentary powers, they should be told that they can only have them on condition of reinforcing the foundations of their line with concrete.

This is not the first attempt that has been made to destroy the usefulness of the Greenwich Observatory. A Fenian or an Anarchist once tried to destroy it. He met, however, with a well-deserved fate, for he blew himself to pieces instead. But he has, I believe the unique honour of being the only person whose crime has been timed to a tenth of a second by the institution that he wished to destroy. If the power of making accurate observations is denied to Greenwich Observatory it will be as much destroyed as if it had been blown up by a Fenian. A considerable portion of the observations and calculations that have been made at Greenwich and in other places during the last 230 years will be rendered useless. If the London County Council continue to interfere with the means of obtaining universal standard time and longitude, they will bring upon themselves the dislike and contempt of the whole civilised world. The Royal Observatory should not be shaken and smoked out of its place by a local body ignorant of what Greenwich is to the world in general. A public Act of Parliament should be passed to protect the Observatory from interference.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord TWEEDMOUTH): My Lords, the noble Lord has made a very vigorous speech on this subject, and I am glad to be able to sympathise with him in his care for the future of Greenwich Observatory. Since this subject has been raised it has been closely considered at the Admiralty. We have been in conference with the authorities at Greenwich and with the representatives of the County Council. As to the origin of this generating station, in 1901 the London County Council resolved on it, and in 1902 a Bill was passed through Parliament. In this Bill was inserted a clause known as the Observatory Clause, which gave to the Board of Trade the power, if any use of electrical power was likely to affect injuriously the instruments used in the Observatory, to require reasonable and proper precautions to be taken. This proposal was made public and approved by Parliament. It is a pity that the County Council had not more closely apprehended the possibility of danger to the Observatory in choosing this particular site, but I think that there was some responsibility also to be attached to the various departments and also to Parliament.

I think that the noble Lord has given an exaggerated account of what has taken place. This afternoon I had a conversation with the Astronomer Royal, and he thinks that at present, at any rate, no absolute damage has been done. I admit, however, that there is an apprehension of it when the station is developed to its fullest power. It will be almost the biggest generating station in the world when completed. Eight engines will work up to 52,000 horse-power, and the electricity generated will, it is supposed, be sufficient to work the whole of the London tramway system. But at the present time the Astronomer Royal says that no serious effect has as yet arisen in the working of the principal meridian instrument. This is a stationary instrument not easily subject to vibration. The Astronomer Royal says, however, that the instrument which has been affected is the portable transit instrument used for determining longitude. There has thus been evidence of some disturbance in this instrument, but the Astronomer Royal says that the interferences are variable and intermittent, and sometimes stop altogether. He added that from the large generating station at Deptford, which is only a quarter of a mile further from the Observatory than this generating station, no damage has resulted, and there is no indication of any disturbance.

What we have to do is to take very careful observation as to what exactly is going on at Greenwich. At present, I believe that the station is never worked up to more than 3,000 horse-power. A trial has been made of two engines, but the experiments were in no sense complete or satisfactory. What I propose to do is to ask Professor Ewing, who lives at Greenwich, and is a distinguished engineer, intimately acquainted with scientific instruments, to represent the Admiralty—he is our Director of Naval Education already—in the observations to be taken, which must extend over a considerable time. I am told that the disturbances that do occur vary very much, and that there is a great deal to be said as to the possibility of meeting the difficulties by reducing the height of the chimneys, though the Astronomer Royal does not think that the vapour of the chimneys as yet seriously interferes with the observations.

I propose also to ask the London County Council to name a representative of their own for the Committee I am about to appoint to report on the whole subject. I have had a conference with members of the County Council—the chairmen of the various committees—in company with the Astronomer Royal, and the County Council have expressed themselves very desirous to meet the wishes of the Admiralty and to do anything reasonable in the way of making such alterations in the plant as would prevent damage to the Observatory.

*VISCOUNT GOSCHEN: My Lords, I cannot say that the statement which has just been made by my noble friend is very reassuring, and there are certain defects in the information which he has been good enough to give to the House. His expressions as to varying interferences and the time that will be taken in order to show the exact effect of them must fill every one of your Lordships with alarm.

One of the questions which suggests itself, however, is whether the County Council in the meanwhile are going to continue this gigantic work? Are there no means of coming to an arrangement with the County Council, that, pending inquiry, they should not continue to spend large sums of money upon these works? Evidently a gigantic mistake has been made—a mistake by the Admiralty, by the Astronomer Royal, by the County Council, and by Parliament, and I do not gather from the tone of the noble Lord, anxious and determined as he is to bring this matter to a satisfactory conclusion, the slightest note of confidence that it will be possible to remove all the objections that have been raised. The matter affects not only the Greenwich Observatory, but the whole scientific world. In these circumstances I scarcely think that the device of continuing the experiments and watching the observations is quite adequate to the enormous importance of the position.

I am aware of the great abilities of Professor Ewing. I am sure, too, that the County Council will bring to bear on the matter the greatest anxiety in the choice of their representative ; but I question whether this is not a work in which the greatest scientists in the Kingdom should be associated in some form or another, so that the country and all those interested should be assured that every scrap of scientific knowledge available in this country, of whatever class, is being brought to bear on the subject. The idea that Greenwich Observatory, that historic scientific monument which has rendered such vast services to the world, and on which so much depends, should be imperilled even in the slightest degree, even by "varying interferences," is really a prospect which few persons can contemplate with equanimity. I conceive that it might come to this, that the whole scheme of the London County Council, notwithstanding their half-million expenditure, might have to be abandoned rather than that the scientific accuracy of Greenwich time should be endangered. It seems only reasonable that the amount involved should not be increased during the considerable time which my noble friend says will be necessary for the conducting of the experiments.

*THE EARL OF CRAWFORD : My Lords, I ask your Lordships' indulgence while I say a few words. The noble Lord in introducing this subject dealt with two aspects of the question, first, the chimney, and second, the effect of the machinery when set in motion inside the generating station. The effect of the chimney is in its relation to the refraction of light, and I would illustrate my meaning by referring to what takes place when the orb of the sun as seen from the deck of a steamer touches the water line on the far horizon. At that instant it is in truth below the horizon. A star seen through a column of heated air is thrown about. A column of air rising up from a tall chimney below the line of vision of the telescope is not uniform in its temperature, and according to the blowing of the wind it passes either to the right or to the left, forward or backward. Consequently the temperature does not remain the same, and the result is that the image of the star which is seen is thrown about violently, and the individual observer is unable to fix it with the definite precision required, and the refraction error is unknown.

It has been suggested that there might be a possibility of lowering the chimneys, but I do not think that would have any very great effect. The chimney at the present time is not much more than two or three degrees above the horizontal point of the horizon. The danger is the heat from the furnaces below the chimneys and the column of hot air passing away. It was found that when the wind was blowing nearly due east, the hot air rising from the chimney was caught by a smart wind and blown away in a horizontal direction before it could rise up and practically destroy the northern horizon. But on a fine night, when there is no wind, the heated air would undoubtedly rise and certainly reach fifteen or even twenty degrees of altitude, destroying all observations which might be required to be made at that altitude by the introduction of the unknown errors.

Reference has been made by the noble Viscount who has just sat down to the mistakes committed by many and various public Departments, but I think there is one mistake which has not been alluded to, but which ought to be noticed in this connection, and that is that the architect to the London County Council had been employed at the Royal Observatory at Greenwich. He was employed to put up the buildings for the important instrument to which the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty referred. The chimney is absolutely on the meridian of that instrument. That ought not to have been allowed. The chimney might easily have been placed in a different position, and I think the architect, knowing the importance of the instrument erected in the Observatory, ought to have noticed this defect.

Tremor is a matter that we are now familiar with in London. I can compare it to what a person feels in walking along the street when one of the large motor omnibuses comes along and shakes the pavement. Another thing one might liken it to is the feeling when you wish to write a note in a train. The shaking to which attention has been called by Lord Ellenborough is so small that an ordinary person might treat it with contempt, yet the movement is very large when taken in connection with the delicate observations which have to be carried on at Greenwich. The essentials for observation of an astronomical kind are stability and quietude. All astronomical observation is a question of measurement either from one body to another or the referring of a heavenly body to a fixed point. Astronomers are compelled to use as a horizon a mercurial mirror, in which the observer is able to see, when the instrument is in perfect order, the real images. As will be readily understood, tremor will affect a basin of mercury. The slightest tremor, set up either by a person walking, by a carriage at a distance, by a train passing, or an engine working, would show itself instantly. The effect is that a star, instead of appearing as a small round disc which one is able to see sharply, is ill-defined and unsteady.

If errors are introduced in this manner, whether by shaking or by abnormal refraction, no harm is done provided we know the magnitude of those errors. Nothing is so dangerous in astronomical observation as the unknown errors which have to be guarded against in the present circumstances at Greenwich. The instrument which I alluded to just now, which has its meridian obstructed by this chimney, is that which is devoted to the observation of the moon. For many years the moon has been given over, by the charter, as it were, of the scientific world, to Greenwich Observatory. Astronomy has grown so vast in its extent, that, as in the case of other branches of science, persons take up groups, none being able to carry the whole work in their heads or to do practical credit to the study of the whole. The Royal Observatory at Greenwich has specialised on the moon, mainly owing to the grand labours of Sir George Airey, the late Astronomer Royal, who by examination of the many hundreds of thousands of observations of the moon reduced those observations down and produced what is called a lunar theory. That is to say, by means of tabular arrangements and mathematical formula the position of the moon at any given time hence may be fairly accurately predicted.

The Earl of Crawford.

The observations at Greenwich and the manner in which they have been carried out by the late Astronomer Royal have led the whole scientific world to say, "Gentlemen, you know your moon so well, pray continue to be responsible for her." In the same way the observation of the minor planets rests with Berlin, and other matters are looked after by American observers. If now Greenwich is reduced to the position of saying that its lunar observations have not the weight and value which so far have attached to them, it will be a terrible blow to the reputation of our Royal Observatory and also to our existence as a scientific country. Another difficulty is that disputes as to boundaries between countries are mainly settled by astronomical observation as to the position of the moon. The easiest way for taking such observations naturally would be by telegraph, but you do not find telegraph cables all over the world, and consequently these boundaries have to be settled by astronomical observations. As the moon is being constantly watched at Greenwich Observatory, applications are frequently received from foreign countries as to the error of the moon at such an hour on such a day. That also shows how extremely important it is that the observations at Greenwich should be reliable.

I understand that in any case Greenwich Observatory will not be the one that will have to move. If it were so, I hardly know how to imagine the result of destroying the position of the meridian of Greenwich. It is difficult for those who are not acquainted with the scientific minutiæ to realise that such is the accuracy demanded of the instruments at Greenwich Observatory. Measures of extension are in fractions of the diameter of a spider's web and hundredths of a second of time. These measurements seem so infinitesimal that you may not think it possible that they could be effected. I will give you an instance. About twenty-eight years ago I had the honour to be on the Board of Visitors of the Royal Observatory. I was at that time President of the Royal Astronomical Society. The Astronomer Royal then told us that the right pier of the transit circle had been sinking for a period of time. It had been going on for some six years. Previous to the meeting of the Board of Visitors in June the errors due to the sinking of this pier had become so great and were so laborious to correct that the Astronomer Royal determined to put the thing right mechanically. He therfore had the transit circle lifted up, moved off the pivots, and beneath the right pivot which carried the big telescope was placed a sheet of paper 180th part of an inch thick. The pivot before this had been too low; after that piece of paper had been put under it it was very slightly too high. But it had taken six years to fall that amount, and the errors were so great, that it was necessary that this should be done.

The Astronomer Royal has told the First Lord of the Admiralty that at the present time, no actual damage has been done. I grant that that is the case, but at all times observations are taken which might be necessary for the purpose of determining a longitude, and I can give you the effect which those observations would have at the present time. I suppose there is no geographical distance, so far as longitude is concerned, better known than the distance between London and Paris. That distance is known certainly with an error not greater than five feet astronomically. Observations which can be obtained at the present time give, not an error of five feet, but an error ranging from fifty to 300 feet. Therefore, though the disturbance caused to the instruments at the Observatory by the County Council's electric works may be infinitely small, that infinitely small disturbance may lead to irreparable damage.

*LORD KELVIN: My Lords, I am sure we are all deeply indebted to the noble Lord who has introduced this subject, and to the noble Earl who has just sat down for his very interesting speech. We must all be deeply impressed with the extreme gravity of this question. The difficulty of seeing what is the right solution is great. But we are comforted by the assurance of the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty that, if either of the two structures is to be removed from Greenwich, it shall not be the Royal Observatory. It would be intolerable that the site of the Royal Observatory should be compulsorily changed. On the other hand, thereis a serious responsibility on account of the large amount of ratepayers' money which has been spent by the London County Council.

If there is any solution by which the electric works at Greenwich can go on without crippling or seriously interfering with the work of the Observatory we shall all, I am sure, be glad. Even at present I think we may look forward to possible changes in the arrangement of the electricity works by which they may not seriously disturb or practically cripple the astronomical observations at Greenwich. A solution which has been suggested—the substitution of steam turbines—is easily spoken of, but not so lightly to be undertaken in respect of machinery already completed. The substitution of steam turbines for reciprocating engines would probably necessitate a different type of electrical machines, and the result of such a substitution might lead to a gigantic piece of "scrapping." I do not know how far the County Council works have progressed.

LORD TWEEDMOUTH: About one half of the works have been completed, but it has not been decided what the engines are to be.

*LORD KELVIN: Then there is still time?

LORD TWEEDMOUTH: Yes.

*LORD KELVIN: I am glad to learn from the noble Lord that there is still time to avert half of the possible damage. I believe that the disturbance caused at the Observatory by the vibration from the electric works might be practically annulled by the substitution of steam turbines for reciprocating engines. The Metropolitan Electric Supply Corporation some ten or fifteen years ago had a great number of complaints of vibration from occupiers of neighbouring houses and from a neighbouring hotel. Several years passed and the complaints became more serious. At last the company boldly resolved to do away with the reciprocating engines and put steam turbines in their place. Since that was done no further complaint has been received. Of course, that does not prove that in the case of the Greenwich Observatory, where such a slight vibration is injurious, the remedy would be effective, but I think most engineers would come to the conclusion that the substitution of steam turbines would practically annul the vibration. I trust that both Houses of Parliament will unite in defending the Royal Observatory from the tremendous disaster which has seemed to be impending. It is no exaggeration to say that the whole world outside, as well as the British Empire, would deplore anything that would injure the great and good work done in the Royal Observatory at Greenwich, and I hope the Government will succeed in preventing that.

*EARL CAWDOR: My Lords, your Lordships will all have listened with much interest to the instructive speeches which have been delivered this evening, and I am sure the noble Lords who have spoken will think that the statement of the First Lord of the Admiralty is not quite satisfactory. I do not propose to go into the question as to who is to blame. We all agree that something has taken place which ought to have been avoided. I was glad to hear from the noble Lord that he had been met in a friendly spirit by the London County Council, but I am bound to say that it does not appear to me quite satisfactory that it should only be propossd to appoint an expert in the person of Professor Ewing, whose great skill we all recognise most fully, and a representative of the London County Council to watch the effect of what is going on.

What we want is to guard most care fully against the slightest increase in the evils which are admitted to exist. The mischief that is being done is not regular. It seems to vary; but the minute difference in measurements effected shows that these matters want watching with the utmost possible care. I hope the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty will be able in a short time to assure us that some further action is being adopted. The first step to be taken, if it is possible to do so, is to stop any further expenditure by the London County Council that may be found to be useless or worse than useless. It appears certain that any further development of the powerful engines that are being used must increase the evils. Therefore we should guard against any further increase in the horse-power used in these works, and I beg the noble Lord to consider the question of getting the assistance of the best expert advice obtainable in this country. I do not undervalue the great ability of Professor Ewing, but the question at issue is a very big one, and one which deserves to the full the best scientific advice that can be procured. I do not know whether there is any legal process by which the London County Council can be stopped from carrying out works that do mischief to the Observatory, but, if not, I think powers should be obtained. I hope the question of cost will not be allowed to stand in the way. The half million of money expended, or partly expended, by the County Council is comparatively a small item when it is remembered what is at stake.

LORD MUSKERRY: May I ask the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the Board of Trade could not act under the Observatory Clause in the County Council's Bill?

LORD TWEEDMOUTH: I have not stated all that I have done in the way of endeavouring to obtain information on this subject, which has only arisen within the last few days. The Law Officers have had the whole question of the powers of the Admiralty and the Board of Trade before them, and they are to advise what those powers are. I have also consulted the Chairman of the Visitors, and he told me that the Visitors comprised all the leading astronomers of this country, and they will, of course, give all the assistance they can in elucidating the question. The London County Council have told me that they would not go on with the two chimneys, which are now only partly erected, and I imagine there will not be much more done with regard to the installation, which is incomplete, and for which the type of engine has not yet been decided.

I hold that it is desirable to discover what the effect of the existing installation really is. It is, I think, necessary that that installation should be worked at its full power in order that we may discover what is the effect on the instruments at Greenwich. I think the House will agree that before doing anything we are bound to discover whether by any rearrangement of the machinery the threatened damage can be averted—for I cannot admit that up to the present moment it is more than a threat of damage. I undertake that every effort shall be made to make the inquiry a thorough one and one which shall command everyone's respect.

THE LORD BISHOP OF SOUTHWARK: Am I right in understanding that the full installation is to be 52,000 horse-power, and that up to the present only 3,000 horse-power has been worked?

LORD TWEEDMOUTH: The full power will be 52,000 horse-power. The amount already installed represents, I think, 26,000 horse-power.

*LORD ELLENBOROUGH: I should like to ask whether I correctly interpreted the noble Lord as saying that only 3,000 horse-power had up to the present time been worked, and that it was intended that the full plant should be 52,000 horse power.

LORD TWEEDMOUTH: I said that on the occasion on which some tremor was observed 3,200 horse-power had been developed.

*LORD ELLENBOROUGH: How much is the whole?

LORD TWEEDMOUTH: Fifty-two thousand horse-power.

THE LORD BISHOP OF SOUTHWARK: If all this difficulty has been caused by 3,000 horse-power and there is a possibility of 52,000 horse-power, the gravity of the matter is considerably enhanced.

JUSTICES AND THE RATES.

*LORD BARNARD: My Lords, I rise to ask His Majesty's Government whether the requirement that the consent of two or more justices must be obtained to certain rates now serves any useful purpose, and, if not, whether they will take any steps to repeal such requirement. I may explain, for the information of those of your Lordships who are not familiar with this matter, that in rural townships and parishes the last proceeding after the poor-rate has been made, and before the rate can be collected, is that it requires to be allowed by two or more justices. I have not been able to discover what the origin of that allowance was, though I think it goes back to the year 1601. There was no doubt good reason at that date for this allowance being required, but I have been unable to ascertain that at the present time the proceeding is of any public utility whatever. On the other hand, I am able to state that it is a matter of some slight expense to the ratepayers, and of very considerable inconvenience. I have before me a letter written by an assistant overseer in which he informs me that in his union it costs the ratepayers some £30 a year, because a fee has to be paid for this allowance by the magistrates. Many of the officials have to go eight or ten miles to find magistrates. What the principle is on which this requirement is based I have not been able to find out, and I beg to ask whether steps cannot be taken to repeal the requirement.

EARL CARRINGTON: My Lords, I agree that on the face of it it is rather difficult to understand why this requirement should be necessary. The requirement, however, is a very old one. I believe it is over 300 years old. The justices do not enter into the question as to whether a rate ought to be made or not; if it is in proper form they must allow it. That is the law as it stands. I have no information that there is any fee to be paid when this ceremony takes place, but I understand from the noble Lord that that is so. So long as the overseers have the duty of making the poor rate it is thought that there is not any very great or sufficient reason for abolishing altogether the allowance of the justices. I am informed that the allowance of a rate by the justices is to prevent the possibility of any bogus rates being raised. Under the present conditions it is thought to be best upon the whole to allow the ancient custom to continue.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Publication of Report of Local Government Board (Scotland).

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): To ask the Secretary for Scotland the cause of the delay in issuing to Members the Annual Report of the Local Government Board for Scotland: and will he state when it will be issued.

(Answered by Mr. Sinclair.) The printing of the Report is being completed, and I hope it will be in the hands of hon. Members at the beginning of next week.

Appointments as Postmen reserved for Ex-Telegraph Messengers.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.): To ask the Postmaster-General whether his attention has been called to the fact that in addition to the 50 per cent. of vacancies for postmen's appointments reserved for ex-naval and military men, they are held as being eligible for a proportion of the remaining 50 per cent., if they have become assistant postmen; and, seeing that this is a breach of the regulation reserving 50 per cent. of these appointments for ex-telegaph messengers and others, will he state what steps he proposes to take.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Baxton.) The hon. Member has been misinformed. An ex-soldier becoming an assistant postman is eligible only for a soldier's vacancy on the postman's class, and nothing is allowed to interfere with the reservation for telegraph messengers of 50 per cent. in full of the vacancies as postmen.

Pigeon Shooting in Egypt.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can state whether the notable who gave the British officers permission to shoot pigeons in the Tantah district of Egypt gave the villagers any intimation that this shooting of tame pigeons would take place.

(Answered by Secretary Sir Edward Grey.) The Answer to this Question is the same as that to the hon. Member's Question No. 2 of to-day.†

MR. WEIR: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that the pigeons in the district of Tantah, Egypt, which were shot at by the British officers whilst on the march from Cairo to Alexandria, were tame pigeons, the property of the villagers; and will he state why these officers visited this village in the neighbourhood of Tantah for the purpose indicated, seeing that they had no knowledge or habits of the fellaheen.

† See next Question.

(Answered by Secretary Sir Edward Grey.) I am unable to make any statement as to the facts of the case. They cannot be accurately known until the trial of the accused persons, which will be held in public, has been brought to a conclusion. (This Answer applies also to the hon. Member's Question No. 1 of to-day.) †

Disturbance by Chinese Coolies at the Nourse Mine.

MR. MOND (Chester): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to a riot at the Nourse mine on 16th June, caused by 400 Chinese coolies; and whether he can state what was the cause of the attack of these 400 Chinese coolies on the house of the compound manager.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) I have seen a statement in the Press to this effect and will make inquiry.

Outrages by Chinese Coolies.

MR. MOND: To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to a meeting at Rossetenville, a suburb of Johannesburg, on the 17th June, to protest against outrages committed by Chinese coolies; and whether the Government will take steps to carry out the recommendation passed at that meeting, that the Labour Importation Association should be compelled to compensate the victims of Chinese outrages.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) I have seen a statement to this effect in the Press. It does not seem possible to hold the Association, so long as it acts within the law, legally liable for the crimes of individual Chinese.

South African Commission for the Control of the Chinese.

MR. MOND: To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce in Johannesburg on the 15th June, when the President explained that the Chamber refused to appear before the Commission for the control of the Chinese on the ground that the Commissioners had been appointed by the Chamber of Mines; and whether the Government will take steps so that the Commissioners appointed to such Commissions shall have no connection with the mining industry.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) I have seen a press telegram of the nature indicated. The Commission in question was appointed by Sir R. Solomon, the Acting Lieutenant-Governor of the Transvaal, and consisted of the resident magistrate of Pretoria, as chairman, the two principal police officials of the Colony, the superintendent of Foreign labour, the Chinese Consul General, and two gentlemen representing the mines, and the Secretary of State sees no reason to object to its composition in view of the terms of reference.

Lighting and Dredging of the Thames Estuary.

MR. J. D. WHITE (Dumbartonshire): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether in view of the increased silting up of the South West Reach of the Swin between the North East Maplin and the South West Middle, the Trinity House will consider the advisability of improving the lighting and buoying of the Barrow Deep so as to afford an alternative north channel suitable at all times for deep-draught vessels, bound to and from the River Thames; and whether steps will be taken to prevent the dumping of dredgings and other material in the Barrow Deep.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) I am informed by the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House that the Barrow Deep channel is already buoyed for daylight navigation, and that they have under consideration the question of lighting it so as to make it available for traffic by night. As regards the dumping of dredgings and other material in the Barrow Deep, I may say that this was stopped in October last and that a special area for such deposits has now been provided in the Black Deep.

Danger to Shipping by Rocks between Ireland's Eye and Howth Harbour.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin County, N.): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been directed to the danger of fishing vessels caused by the flat rocks in the Sound between Ireland's Eye and Howth Harbour; and whether he will cause the proper authority to place a buoy in the place indicated.

---

† See preceding Question.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) The Board of Trade do not possess the power suggested in the latter part of the Question. I have, however, communicated with the Commissioners of Irish Lights, who inform me that they do not consider that the placing of a buoy in the position indicated is a matter for them to deal with.

Naval Training—Artisan and Artificers Branches.

MR. J. WILLIAMS BENN (Devonport): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether in view of the statement in the Report of the Douglas Committee as to the disappearance of the boatswain and carpenter, any steps will be taken under the new system to train and utilise existing servants in these branches in some kindred employment.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) The statement referred to was a suggestion on the part of the Sub-Committee that the duties of the present artisan branches might be rearranged in the future so as to admit of the carrying out of those duties by the artificer branch. Assuming that this suggestion was approved by the Admiralty, the change would take place gradually, and would not involve the discharge of men from the service. If any action be taken, the question of utilising artisans in a new capacity, for which they might be qualified, would be carefully considered. Of course, in making any radical change, existing rights would receive due consideration.

Transfer of Postal Clerks from London to Edinburgh and Dublin—Reduction of Salary.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that women clerks who are transferred from the General Post Office in London to offices in Dublin or Edinburgh have their maximum salaries reduced by £10 per annum in consequence of such transfer, while no reduction is made in the salaries of men clerks similarly transferred; whether the duties of women clerks in the offices in Dublin and Edinburgh are identical with those of women clerks in London; whether this reduction of salary is not a violation of the condition upon which these clerks obtained their appointment; whether the prospects of promotion of these clerks is not very much lessened in in consequence of being transfered to the post offices in Dublin or Edinburgh; and whether he will consider the question with a view to putting all these women clerks, as far as possible, upon the same scale of salaries as to the women clerks in the General Post Office, London.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I may, perhaps, be allowed to refer the hon. Member to the Answer which I gave on the 14th instant to a similar Question relating to transfers between London and Dublin asked by the hon. Member for South Belfast. Transfers to Edinburgh are arranged on the same lines as transfers to Dublin.

Ordance Survey Staff—7th Division (Carlisle).

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON (Northumberland, Tyneside): To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether the staff of the 7th Division (Carlisle) of the Ordnance Survey is likely to be reduced in the near future; and whether, in the event of such a reduction being found necessary, the men selected for discharge will be drawn from those with less than fifteen years' service.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) The 7th Division is at present employed in Ireland on the survey of county Lough, and on the completion of this work in two years time the Division will resume revision work in England. This will involve the removal of all the surveyors from the Division, but I hope that it will be possible to continue the services of these men in other capacities or in other Divisions. In the selection of men for discharge, the cases of men with more than fifteen years' service will be most carefully and sympathetically considered, but there is a certain amount of work on the survey which must be always done by youths.

Offences under the Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs Act 1893.

MR. ALEXANDER CROSS (Glasgow, Camlachie): To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, if he will furnish a Return of the complaints coming before that Board under The Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs Act, 1893, during the last five years, with the names of the persons concerned and a note of the essential points of complaint, for each year separately; also if he will grant a Return of the number of criminal prosecutions which have occurred under this Act during the period, and of the results of each criminal prosecution.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) We could not undertake to furnish a Return of the complaints made to the Board as to the specific cases arising under the Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs Act, for the reason that the information given is more or less of a confidential character. The enforcement of the Act, moreover, rests with the local authorities, and it is to those authorities and to the vendors that such complaint would ordinarily be addressed. Information as to the more general representations which we have received as to the working of the Act will be found in the Report and Minutes of Evidence of the recent Departmental Committee. Prosecutions under the Act may be undertaken by county councils without reference to the Board, and we have no information as the number which have taken place. Two applications have been made to the Board for certificates authorising a prosecution under Section 3 of the Act. The certificate was refused in one case and granted in the other, but we were not informed whether proceedings were actually instituted, and, if so, with what result.

Suggested Issue of Large Scale Ordnance Survey Maps of the United Kingdom.

MR. G. GREENWOOD (Peterborough): To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, if he can see his way to instruct the Ordnance Survey Department to issue maps of the United Kingdom on the scale of two inches to the statute mile.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) I am afraid it is not possible for us to adopt the suggestion made by my hon. friend. The preparation of a map on the proposed scale would involve a very considerable cost and would take some years to complete. Perhaps, however, he would confer personally with me on the subject.

Position of Clerks to Surveyors of Taxes.

MR. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether in view of the fact that out of 600 clerks to surveyors of taxes, 373 had served permanently in such offices for periods ranging from five years to thirty years and upwards, he can explain upon what grounds the Treasury regard such clerkships as only of a temporary nature; whether he is aware that the surveyors of taxes strongly condemn the present system of clerical hire, and recently presented a petition to the Board of Inland Revenue praying for their clerks' establishment, in the interests of the revenue and the public; and whether taking into account the surveyors' recommendation, the lengthy service of the clerks, and the fact that they are engaged upon work of a confidential nature in connection with the income tax, he will institute an inquiry into the status and treatment of these clerks.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) The question of substituting established clerks for the personal clerks employed by the surveyors was considered in connection with the surveyors' memorial last year and also on other occasions. For some years a considerable number of established clerks were employed, but the arrangement was found to be unsatisfactory, and was abandoned in 1893. The present system is preferred, not only as being more economical, but also as more convenient for adaptation of the staff to the requirements of the localities.

Rateable Value and Representation of Manchester.

MR. H. J. TENNANT (Berwickshire): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to a Return of the Corporation of the City of Manchester setting forth the rateable value of the various wards, the numbers of limited liability companies in those wards and their rateable value, from which it can be deduced that as much as 45 per cent. of the rateable value is in some cases unrepresented at municipal elections; and whether he can propose any method of altering the system under which representation is so partial and capricious.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I have not seen the Return of the Corporation of Manchester referred to in the Question. I have received particulars sent for the purposes of the Return, moved for by my hon. friend, from which it appears that the rateable value of the premises at Manchester, in respect of the occupation of which no persons are entered in the lists of municipal electors, because the hereditaments are occupied by corporations, or joint stock or other companies, amounts to 32 per cent. of the total rateable value of the city. I am not able to promise to introduce the legislation which would be necessary to alter this state of things.

Religious Processions in Eastern Bengal.

SIR H. COTTON (Nottingham, E.): To ask the Secretary of State of India whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that a Harisankirtan party, consisting of twelve men, and constituting a procession of a purely religious character, were arrested by the police on the 28th May for passing through the streets of Muktagacha, in the Mymensingh district of the province of Eastern Bengal and Assam, and for singing religious songs; and whether, looking to the fact that religious processions of this character have been customary in Muktagacha during the past eighteen years, and that they are now interfered with under the recent orders authorising the police to require licences for public processions, he will issue instructions to the Government of India that religious processions shall not be obstructed by the police.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) As I stated in reply to a Question on the 14th June,† the only restrictions on processions, religious or otherwise, now in force in Eastern Bengal are those imposed by the ordinary law. A procession of the kind referred to would in ordinary circumstances call for no action by the police, but the recent rioting between Hindus and Mahomedans in Mymensingh may have rendered a stricter enforcement of the law necessary.

Publicity of Indian Courts of Justice.

SIR H. COTTON: To ask the Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the magistrate of Backergunge, in Eastern Bengal and Assam, is in the habit of disposing of criminal cases in his private room, and occasionally in his own private residence, to which the public are not admitted; and whether, inasmuch at this practice has been condemned as irregular by the High Court, and is prejudicial to the administration of justice, he will address the Government of India with a view to putting a stop to it.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) I have no information as to the existence of the irregular practices to which the hon. Member refers. I hope that the irregularity, if truly stated in the Question, has been dealt with by the local government.

Revaluation of Ireland—Methods of Assesing.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Government will consider the advisability in any proposed revaluation in Ireland, of previously adopting the system of local assessors to act in conjunction with the Commissioner of Valuation as invariably practised in Great Britain; whether he will explain the difference in the adjusting machinery for taxation purposes existing between the two islands; and whether he will arrange, as a sequence of the Local Government Act, that the methods of assessing and revising assessments shall be similar throughout the three Kingdoms.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) The systems of valuation in the two countries are so different that no useful comparison can be made between them, but I may mention that in England the cost of valuation for local taxation purposes falls upon the local authorities. In Ireland the work is done by a Government Department and the cost is defrayed mainly by the Exchequer. In this respect, therefore, the present system is favourable to Ireland, and I doubt whether in these circumstances an assimilation to the practice in England would be generally welcomed.

Superintendent Registrars and Lists of Deaths.

MR. MACVEAGH: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that a Privy Council Order in 1899 required superintendent registrars to supply for electoral registration purposes annual lists of persons dying within the union; that another Order, issued last November, fixed the remuneration to superintendent registrars at two pence per name; that another Order was issued last February requiring the registrars of births and deaths to furnish the Returns; that last month another Order was issued revoking all previous Orders and requiring the superintendent registrars to collect the information at their own cost and without remuneration; and whether he will direct inquiries to be made with a veiw to ascertaining whether remuneration can be provided, as contemplated by the Order of November.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The facts are substantially as stated in the Question. I understand the amending Order of November 4th, 1905, was passed with the object of imposing the duty in question upon registrars, and of providing remuneration for these officers, but by an oversight the words "superintendent registrar" were inserted instead of the word "registrar," and the Order of February 7th, 1906, was thereupon made with the object of correcting this error. It was subsequently ascertained that no legal power exists for authorising the payment of remuneration for the performance of the duty, and it was therefore found necessary to revoke the Order of February 7th. This was done by the Order of May 18th, 1906, and the outcome of the whole matter is that the performance of the duty, without remuneration, is reimposed upon superintendant registrars as under the original Order of 1899. Further inquiry in the matter is unnecessary. It has been decided definitely that there is no power to authorise payment of remuneration.

Interference of Lady Guardian with discipline of Londonderry Union.

MARQUESS OF HAMILTON (Londonderry): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if the attention of the Local Government Board has been drawn to the interference with the discipline in the Londonderry union workhouse, on May 12th last, by a member of the Board opening the door of the punishment ward without authority, and releasing an inmate who had been placed there a short time previously, by the master of the workhouse for disorderly conduct; and what action the Local Government Board propose taking to prevent a recurrence of such unauthorised interference by guardians.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Local Government Board have ascertained that, on the date named, the master of the Londonderry workhouse sent a female inmate to the refractory ward, and ordered that she should be kept there for seven hours. The woman was, however, liberated, after four and a-half hours' detention, by a lady guardian. The board of guardians subsequently expressed their disapproval of the lady guardian's action, and directed that the master should, in future, lock the ward when occupied, and see that the key is in safe keeping. In these circumstances the Local Government Board do not consider action on their part to be necessary.

Nelson Beef Company and Army supplies.

MR. FIELD: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether the meat contract for the supply to the troops quartered at London, Woolwich, and Windsor, has been placed with Nelson, Morris, and Company; will he say whether this American firm is amongst those whose manufactured imports to this country have been subjected to serious allegations of condemnation; whether this contract has been secured at the lowest price; whether he can arrange that the Army Council will take precautions to insure that the best quality of fresh meat will be supplied; and whether he can state why preference was given to foreign importers to the exclusion and prejudice of native agriculturists.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The meat contract for these stations has been placed with the Morris Beef Company, of the Central Meat Market, London. I have no information as to whether the American branch of this firm is associated with other Chicago firms in the present controversy. The lowest price secured this contract. Inspection is provided for in the contract so as to secure quality. No preference was given to foreign importers, the contract being placed on price.

Good Conduct Medal for Henry Hulme, late Cheshire Regiment.

MR. R. PEARCE (Staffordshire, Leek): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that Henry Hulme, late quartermaster sergeant Cheshire Regiment, whose discharge is dated December 18th, 1897, and who holds five good conduct medals, and served twenty-one years without an entry in the regimental default sheet for the last eighteen years, has not yet received a good conduct medal, though applied for before discharge, and finally on December 8th 1905, when the captain acting ajdutant, depot Cheshire Regiment, replied that the application was too late and should have been submitted within six months of discharge; and whether, in view of the facts, the delay may be excused and the medal granted.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) Under the King's Regulations, recommendations for good conduct medals are to be submitted half-yearly, and to include cases of men discharged within the previous six months. No recommendation has been received in the War Office in connection with Mr. Hulme. If he will apply to the War Office his case shall be investigated.

Date of Publication of Report of the Ecclesiastical Disorders Commission.

DR. HAZEL (West Bromwich): To ask the Prime Minister if he can give any further information as to the probable date of the issue of the Report of the Royal Commission on Ecclesiastical Disorders; and whether, failing the issue of the Report, he is willing to take steps to expedite the separate issue of the evidence taken by the Commission, so that it may be in the hands of Members before or during the discussion in Committee of Clause 4 of the Education Bill.

(Answered by Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman.) I am unable to give any further information as to the date of the issue of the Report of the Royal Commission, nor am I in a position to expedite the publication of the evidence, as my hon. friend suggests.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Militia Officers' Allowances.

SIR ROBERT HOBART (Hampshire, New Forest): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the dearth of Militia officers, he will consider the advisability of their travelling expenses to and from their homes, when beyond the confines of the county, to the place of joining being paid.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. HALDANE, Haddingtonshire): A considerable sum of money would be involved by the grant of this concession, and I am afraid that at the present time no funds are available for the purpose.

1st Battalion Royal West Kent Regiment—Master Tailor.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the fact that ex-Sergeant Thomas Pressley, who served as master tailor in the 1st Battalion Royal West Kent Regiment, desired to re-engage for twenty-one years, was ordered by Colonel Maunsell to retire, and the fact that Pressley was given an exemplary discharge, he will call for a further report of this case with the view of his reinstatement, or the production of some evidence in accordance with Army regulations of Pressley's inefficiency or misdemeanour.

*MR. HALDANE: As I have already informed the hon. Member, I have had full inquiries made into this case, and I have satisfied myself that the military authorities concerned had good reasons for refusing to allow this man to extend his service. Mr. Pressley was offered permission to re-engage as a sergeant; though a good workman, he was found to be unfitted for the duties of the appointment of master tailor, who is charged with the supervision of the tailoring work of the regiment. I am not prepared to reopen the case.

Mr. SLOAN: Is it not the case that the man did fill the post for four years, and that the only cause of his losing it was that he went out to the Boer War.

*Mr. HALDANE: No, he was not re-engaged because, in the opinion of those who supervised the work, he was not fitted for the post.

Ammunition for Volunteers.

Mr. COURTHOPE (Sussex, Rye): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that Volunteer battalions are supplied with small arms ammunition of mixed date and manufacture, and that such ammunition is variable and makes accurate shooting impossible: and whether he will provide that in future all the ammunition supplied to any unit shall be of the same date and source of manufacture.

*Mr. HALDANE: It is necessary to use up the ammunition returned from South Africa after the war. The cartridges are unloaded, the cases recapped and reloaded; proof is then taken and issue is only made on satisfactory results as regards shooting. The date of the manufacture is not known. I will consider whether it can be arranged that cartridges from different makers be kept separate.

Soldiers' and Sailors' Families' Association.

*Mr. MORTON (Sutherland): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the Soldiers' and Sailors' Families' Association refuse to admit the widows and daughters of officers, who have risen from the ranks, to the houses for officers' widows and daughters at Wimbledon; and will he say whether the association is supported out of regimental funds.

*Mr. HALDANE: The funds of the officers' branch of this association are not supported by regimental subscriptions, and the War Office has no hand in their administration.

*Mr. MORTON: But is the statement as to the widows and daughters of officers who have risen from the ranks correct?

*Mr. HALDANE: I do not know. I am not responsible for the association. It is a private organisation. We do not contribute anything to it.

The Duke of Connaught.

Mr. MORTON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will state in what capacity the Duke of Connaught is visiting the Scandinavian countries; if he is doing so at the public expense; and will he also say what are the duties of His Majesty's Inspector-General of the Forces.

*Mr. HALDANE: His Royal Highness is visiting Sweden to be present at the christening of the grandson of the Crown Prince. I am informed that he is paying any personal expenses incurred while on board the Admiralty yacht. As regards the last part of the Question, my hon. friend will find the duties fully set forth in the Order in Council of 10-8-1904, contained in Cd. 2252 of 1904.

Meat Rations at Ballykinlar Camp.

Captain CRAIG (Down, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in accordance with a War Office order, tinned beef is to be issued as a ration to the Militia brigade at Ballykinlar Camp, county Down, on Friday the 22nd instant; and whether, in view of the recent revelations concerning the canning of meat, he will give instructions that fresh Irish beef or mutton be supplied to those troops in lieu of the ration mentioned.

*Mr. HALDANE: Issues of meat, whether fresh or preserved, to the Militia Brigade at Ballykinler Camp are arranged locally, and not by the War Office. Orders have, however, been given by the War Office to suspend issues of American brands of preserved meat in Ireland until the report has been received from the officer sent to America to investigate.

Treatment of Zulu Rebels.

Mr. JOWETT (Bradford, W.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has any official information showing that native rebels in Natal who have surrendered or been taken prisoners have been sent to work in the Kimberley mines; and, if so, if he proposes to make any representations to the Natal Government on the matter.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. CHURCHILL, Manchester, N.W.): I would refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave yesterday to a similar Question by the Member for North Salford.†

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): Is it not the fact that some of these political prisoners have been sent to Kimberley, and is it not the practice that all convicts sent to Kimberley are worked in the diamond mines for the benefit of the proprietors?

MR. CHURCHILL: In answer to my hon. friend, I can only say that I have no reason to believe that any Natal insurgents have been or are likely to be employed in the Kimberley diamond mines; but the opinion which has been made clear in the House in the conversation which took place at Question time yesterday has been brought to the notice of the Secretary of State, and will be considered. I do not wish to make any further statement on the matter, but my hon. friend may be perfectly sure that it will not be overlooked.

MR. BYLES (Salford, N.): How soon may we again put a Question on the subject of the employment of these men in the Kimberley mines?

MR. CHURCHILL: Tuesday or Wednesday next week.

Chinese Crime in South Africa.

MR. J. WARD (Stoke-on-Trent): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the fact that, in the week ending 17th June, the following list of crimes and results of crimes committed by Chinese were recorded, viz., two hanged for murder, two tried for keeping a disorderly house in which white women resided, one shot dead while attempting to break into a house in the Heidelburg district, robbery of a house in Rossetenville, a suburb of Johannesburg, where the owner and his wife were maltreated and threatened; and what action, if any, he proposes to take to prevent such occurrences.

MR. CHURCHILL: I have read these statements in the Press, and am making inquiry by telegraph.

The Repatriation Proclamation.

MR. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the fact that the Imperial Government is responsible for all charges in connection with payment of expenses to China of any Chinese coolies imported under the Ordinance who are dissatisfied with their engagement, and the confusion which has arisen between the instructions given by the Government and the Chinese translation thereof, the Government will issue a proclamation in plain English of their intentions, and instruct the authorities on the spot to publish the same in the mines, and the translation thereof in Chinese; and also lay the proclamation and Chinese translation upon the Table of the House.

MR. CHURCHILL: As I told the hon. Member for Bath yesterday,‡ this matter is the subject of inquiry and consideration.

MR. CATHCART WASON: Is the hon. Gentleman going to give us a copy of this proclamation?

MR. CHURCHILL: I shall be very glad to send the hon. Gentleman one for his information.

MR. CATHCART WASON: I want to see the Papers on the Table.

MR. CHURCHILL: I think the proclamation as it was read out by me to the House is to be found in Hansard.§ As to the version posted in the mines, we have consulted a distinguished Chinese scholar, and we shall be able to compare the one with the other in two or three days.

MR. CATHCART WASON: Is it not the intention of the Government to issue another proclamation on this subject?

† See (4) Debates, clix., 168.

§ See (4) Debates, clvi., 70.

MR. CHURCHILL: That is a decision which cannot be taken until the two versions have been examined and compared.

MR. J. WARD: Does not the hon. Gentleman think it would be advisable to draw up a proclamation in English with all the promises and pledges of the Government on this subject, and then have it translated into Chinese?

MR. BLAKE (Longford, S.): And will the House have an opportunity of discussing this proclamation again?

MR. CHURCHILL: The matter is under consideration at this moment, but before we are able to announce any decision to the House we must have an opportunity of seeing whether any alterations or additions were made in the process of translating from English into Chinese. If that should be established, I recognise the fact that the question of the proclamation generally will come once again into the area of consideration.

MR. BOTTOMLEY (Hackney, S.): May I ask the hon. Gentleman who was the Chinese authority who translated this proclamation, and whether the hon. Gentleman is aware that the Secretary to the Chinese Legation says that he is unable to find any competent authority to translate into Chinese the version of the proclamation which the hon. Gentleman read to this House.

MR. CHURCHILL: I cannot give the name of the Chinese authority who translated the proclamation, because I do not know it; but if the hon. Member will ask a Question next week, I hope to be able to give him an Answer; I cannot believe it is beyond the power of the Government to get a Chinese translation.

Swadeshi Movement in Bengal.

SIR H. COTTON (Nottingham, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the order of the Lieutenant-Governor of Eastern Bengal and Assam, directing the readmission of students in that province who had been expelled from school, is limited in its operation to the Dacca and Rungpore districts; to the fact that four students of the Chanchal Sideswari higher English school, in the district of Maldah, were lately expelled for having taken part in a Swadeshi movement, and that their names, together with the names of their fathers, guardians, and of the places of their residence were officially forwarded to all headmasters of Government and aided and unaided schools in the province, with a view to prevent the admission of the boys into any other school; and whether he will issue instructions that the orders for the readmission of students who have been expelled on so-called political considerations shall be extended to these Maldah boys, and be made general in their application to the whole province.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. JOHN MORLEY, Montrose Burghs): I am not aware of all the facts mentioned in the Question, but I will make immediate inquiry on the subject.

Massacres of Jews in Russia.

MR. THORNE (West Ham, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the unchecked massacre of Jews at Biolostoc now going on; whether he has observed the execution by hanging of children of tender age by the Russian Government at Riga; whether he has been informed of the systematic persecution of innocent people at Moscow, Kieff, Warsaw, and other large towns; and whether, seeing that this country broke off diplomatic relations with Servia, and constantly remonstrates with Turkey for less serious outrages, he will consider whether the time has come that Great Britain should protest formally against the continuance of such practices by the Russian Government, and break off diplomatic relations until they are put an end to.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir EDWARD GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): The Answer is in the negative.

MR. J. RAMSAY MACDONALD (Leicester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to the outbreak of Jewish massacres in Western Russia in which the Russian authorities are implicated; and whether, in consequence, he will reconsider the propriety of sending British warships at the present moment on a friendly official visit to Russian Baltic ports.

SIR EDWARD GREY: I cannot add anything to the Answer I gave the other day to the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil.†

Attack on British Officers in Egypt.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is now in a position to give any further information as to the attack on British officers in Egypt; whether the officers were in uniform or in the execution of any military duty when the affray took place; whether he can give the text of that portion of the Khedivial decree under which the accused are to be sent for trial before the special tribunal; who decides in such cases whether accused are to be tried before the special tribunal or the ordinary courts; and what provision has been made for the defence of the prisoners.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The officers were in uniform when the affray took place. The text of the sixth Article of the Khedivial decree (translated from the French) is as follows:—"All crimes and misdemeanours committed by natives against soldiers or officers of the British Army shall continue, in principle, to be tried by the native tribunals. They shall only be dealt with by the special tribunal in special cases when the Agent and Consul of Great Britain shall, at the request of the General Commanding the army of occupation, and in agreement with him, so demand of the Minister for Foreign Affairs." Article 4 of the decree gives the accused the right to have an advocate Tax Assessment and Collection.

MR. SEARS (Cheltenham): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if his attention has been drawn to the following Reports of the Board of Inland Revenue, in each of which they condemn the system of assessing and collecting taxes by means of parochial officers: 2nd Report, 1858, pages 24 and 25; 4th Report, 1860, page 23; 5th Report, 1861, page 19; 6th Report, 1862, pages 18 and 19; 8th Report, 1864, page 21; and 12th Report, 1869, page 29; if he is aware that a Bill was introduced at the instance of the Board in 1863, and that at page 21 of their 8th Report in 1864 they expressed their regret that it was not passed, and stated that by the employment of Government instead of parochial officers they hoped to effect a saving of probably not less than £50,000 a year, besides relieving the taxpayer of the responsibility to make good the defalcations of parochial collectors; and what steps he proposes to take to give effect to the opinions expressed in favour of reform.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifeshire, E.): No steps are contemplated for giving effect to the opinions referred to, of which the most recent appears to have been expressed nearly forty years ago, and which have no application to the existing state of things.

MR. SEARS: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will say what was the effect of the transfer of certain duties in 1867 from assessment and collection by parochial officers to Government officers; whether he is aware that the number of dog licences issued increased in ten months from 445,000 to 828,000 (11th Report, Board of Inland Revenue, 1867, p. 14), and in ten years to 1,362,000 (21st Report, 1877, p. 21); and is he aware that increased revenue would follow the transfer of further duties to Government officials from the more accurate assessment and prompt collection of taxes still in the hands of parochial officers.

MR. ASQUITH: The transfer of duties connected with dog licences in 1867 was a transfer from one set of Government officials to another, and not from parochial officers to Government officers. These is no reason to suppose that increased revenue would result from a change in the present system of collection of taxes.

MR. SEARS: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is aware that the cost of the services of clerks to the local tax commissioners and of parochial assessors and collectors of taxes, which twenty years ago was £295,000 a year, is now £329,000; and whether he will take steps to inquire into this expenditure, and to ascertain the annual saving in public expense in employing Government officers that may be effected, seeing that it was estimated by the Board of Inland Revenue in their 8th Report, 1864, page 21, that a saving of £50,000 a year would have resulted from such a change.

† See (4) Debates, clviii., 1366.

MR. ASQUITH: The present Board of Inland Revenue are not in a position to question the opinions formed and expressed by their predecessors in 1864 in respect of the changes which at that time were under consideration. But, in the circumstances of the present day, the Board are strongly of opinion: (a) that so long as the assessment of income-tax is entrusted to bodies of unpaid Commissioners, it is essential that these Commissioners should be provided with the services of competent clerks, who can advise them in regard to the law of income-tax; (b) that the remuneration at present paid to such clerks is not excessive; and (c) that no economy would result from substituting official for parochial collectors of taxes.

Ejectment Orders.

MR. O'GRADY (Leeds, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in view of the varying decisions given by the stipendiary magistrates and bench of justices in the London area respecting ejectment orders against householders, lodgers, and tenement occupiers, he will issue an order that in future the uniform time of twenty-one days shall be adopted in these matters.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): I understand there is a difference of opinion on this question, which leads to a difference of practice, but which could be settled only by a judicial decision. I have no power to settle it, nor to issue any order on the subject.

*MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): Will the right hon. Gentleman instruct the metropolitan police that in carrying out these orders, they must not deposit the goods in the street, and so break one law in executing another?

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not think I have any power on this subject.

Metropolitan Police Holidays.

MR. SEAVERNS (Lambeth, Brixton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether there is now a balance from the Police Rate of £700,000 in the hands of the Commissioner of Police; and whether this balance and the improved financial position resulting from the recent quinquennial assessment will receive his attention in his consideration of the possibility of granting to the members of the Metropolitan Police Force one day's rest in seven.

MR. GLADSTONE: I agree that it is essential to consider the financial position of the Metropolitan Police Fund in connection with the subject mentioned in the question, but the result of that consideration is unfortunately not what the hon. Member desires. On March 31st last, when the half-yearly receipts from the parishes had just come in there was a net balance of £500,000 to credit of the Metropolitan Police and Police Pension Funds; but the balance in hand had fallen on Monday last to £152,921; and this amount, together with any receipts which may become available in the interval, is insufficient to meet the expense of the Metropolitan Police Service for the next eight weeks, that is, until August 10th, when the next Rate Warrants become payable. It will be necessary during this period to borrow temporarily from the Bank of England. Further, the increased income of the fund for the current financial year resulting from the growth of the assessable value of the Metropolitan Police District, is estimated at £55,600 while the increased charge for the pay of the force resulting from the much needed augmentations which have been recently sanctioned amounts to £56,000.

Alien Immigrants.

MR. FELL (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, seeing that it is impossible to deport aliens in some cases where orders have been made for their expulsion, owing to the difficulty in establishing their nationality, he will consider the advisability of making want of nationality a ground for refusing their admission to this country.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not prepared to propose the amendment of the Aliens Act, which would be necessary to carry out this suggestion.

Workshops as Sleeping Apartments.

MR. ARTHUR HENDERSON (Durham, Barnard Castle): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any official information showing that the number of domestic workshops in the clothing trade used as sleeping apartments is increasing; and, if so, whether he will consider the advisability of using the powers conferred by Section 3 of the Factory Act, 1901, for the purpose of substantially increasing the cubic space required in such places.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am afraid I have no official information on this subject, nor should I have any power to deal with the matter under Sub-section 3 of Section 3 of the Factory Act, as domestic workshops are expressly excluded from the operation of that provision. I may point out, however, that any house or part of a house so overcrowded as to be injurious to the health of the inmates constitutes a nuisance under the Public Health Act, with which the local authority have full power to deal.

Aliens in the East End of London.

MR. FELL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, now the Aliens Act has been in operation for nearly six months, he proposes to again revise the regulations framed under it, and make them more effective for the purpose of excluding more of those who compete with the workers in the East End of London, and to benefit such aliens as may still be allowed to come in.

MR. GLADSTONE: I cannot say more than that I shall continue to watch carefully the working of the Aliens Act.

Women's Suffrage Disturbance.

MR. KEIR HARDIE (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the proceedings at Marylebone Police Court this morning, when Miss Theresa Billington was fined £10, or two months, on a charge of assaulting the police; whether the alleged assault was only committed this morning, and, as a consequence, the accused was unable to make provision for being legally represented; whether the sentence is not extreme; and whether he will stay the sentence till he has made an inquiry, in consideration of all the circumstances involved.

MR. TREVELYAN (Yorkshire, W.R., Elland): On the same subject, may I ask whether my right hon. friend is aware that up to as late as this morning the Metropolitan Police had been unable to deal with the riotous behaviour of certain women in Cavendish Square; whether he is aware that this method of trying to promote the cause of women's suffrage meets with the deepest and most outspoken disapproval of the mass of the advocates of that reform, both women and men; and whether he is satisfied that the measures now taken by the Metropolitan Police are sufficient to preserve order?

MR. KEIR HARDIE: I desire to ask whether it is in order for an hon. Member to bring a charge of riotous proceedings against persons who are not present to defend themselves.

*MR. SPEAKER: I did not catch the hon. Member's first Question; the second seemed to be out of order, and the third seemed to be in order.

MR. GLADSTONE: In answer to the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil, I received his letter only five minutes ago, and I have therefore no information to enable me to answer his Question. I therefore suggest that he should put it down for Monday. In regard to the Question of my hon. friend, my attention has been called to the circumstances of this case. I am not quite sure how much of the Question is in order. All I can do now is to say that I am informed that the police did take proceedings this morning against certain women, and I trust there will be no renewal of the disturbance.

MR. KEIR HARDIE: In view of the fact that this lady has been sent to prison, will not the right hon. Gentleman cause inquiries to be made, so as to be able to reply to a Question which I shall put to him to-night on the Motion for the Adjournment? The matter is one of urgency. Does not the right hon. Gentleman consider two months' imprisonment a most excessive sentence for such a trivial offence?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have no power at all to interfere with any judicial decision, except when I am of opinion that the prerogative of mercy should be used. I cannot interfere as the hon. Member suggests, and I can hold out no hope that I shall be able to answer the hon. Member's Question on the Adjournment.

MR. KEIR HARDIE: Inasmuch as the alleged offence took place at ten o'clock this morning, and the trial between eleven and twelve, so that the accused person had no opportunity of preparing a defence, will the right hon. Gentleman say whether such precedure is customary in the police courts?

MR. GLADSTONE: It is customary in cases brought before the London police-courts summarily, where the magistrate considers they ought to be dealt with summarily.

Scathwaite Waterworks Accident.

MR. J. WARD: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to an accident at the new waterworks, Scathwaite Tarn, near Barrow, on May 21st from an explosion, killing two workmen and seriously injuring three others; whether his Department were officially represented at the inquest; and, if so, what Report, if any, has been received upon the subject; and whether, in view of the frequency of these explosions upon public works and the injury caused by them, he will consider the advisability of framing legislation to regulate the use of explosives upon such works.

MR. GLADSTONE: I beg to answer this question on behalf of my right hon. friend. The accident referred to was reported to the Inspector of Mines and the inquest was attended by the assistant inspector. I have received a Report from H.M. Inspector of Explosives from which it appears that the explosion was caused by boring into an unexplored portion of a previous charge, a not uncommon cause of accident, attributable, I am sorry to say, in many cases to personal carelessness. The use of explosives in mines and quarries is already regulated. The question of extending protective provisions to railway workings and other unregulated places shall receive my consideration.

Patent Specifications.

MR. J. D. WHITE (Dumbartonshire): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the statement made on page 8 of the Annual Report of the Patent Office for 1905 that, by consulting the abridgments of British patent specifications, an inventor is now enabled to make a complete fireside search for all inventions prior to 1901 which might invalidate his own; and whether he will consider the advisability of qualifying this statement, in view of the fact that such invalidating may result from anticipation in any of the foreign specifications to which the public has access at the Patent Office Library as well as in many other ways which are outside the scope of the abridgments.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE, Carnarvon Boroughs): The inventions dealt with in the part of the Report in which the passage in question occurs are inventions patented in this country, and I think that any one reading the passage together with its context would understand it to refer solely to inventions protected by British patents. Read in this sense, the passage is correct as it stands.

Indian Mail Service.

MR. LAIDLAW (Renfrewshire, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if, in view of the fact that under present arrangements, delays frequently take place in the arrival of the Indian mails in this country, through much time being lost between Port Said and Brindisi, he will in the next contract, whilst imposing a penalty for delay beyond contract time, offer a reward for earlier delivery, so that it may be to the interest of the steamship company to make good time rather than to slow down in order to save coal; and also whether he will in the new contract of next year stipulate for an accelerated mail service between Bombay and Brindisi so as to give delivery in London early on Friday, in order that urgent correspondence may be answered on the same day.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I do not think it would be advisable to offer premiums for arrivals in advance of the time fixed by the mail contract, since it is more important to obtain a regular service at a high rate of speed than to encourage special rapidity on particular voyages, with resulting irregularity in the time of arrival. Future arrangements for the Indian Mail service will depend to a large extent on the replies to the invitations to tender issued not long ago; and I am not now prepared to commit myself in any way as to the duration of the transit.

Register of Teachers.

SIR WILLIAM ANSON (Oxford University): I beg to ask the President of Education what is the total number of names now entered on Column B. of the of the Register of Teachers; and how many of these have been entered since September 30th, 1905.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. LOUGH, Islington, W.): The total number of names registered in Column B. up to to-day is:—Under the permanent clauses of the Regulations 264; under the temporary clauses of the Regulations, 11,028; Total 11,292. Of these the number registered since September 30th is:—Under the permanent clauses of the Regulations, 59; under the temporary clauses of the Regulations, 1,244; Total 1,303.

Women on Education Authorities.

*MR. LEIF JONES (Westmoreland, Appleby): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether he proposes to introduce into the Education Bill Amendments which shall restore to women the right to be elected on education authorities, of which they were deprived by the Education Act of 1902.

MR. LOUGH: The Board of Education are in full sympathy with the hon. Member in desiring to see women given a responsible position in the direction of public education. Their exclusion from the present local education authorities (except as possibly co-opted members on their education committees) is one of the results of the last Government's educational legislation which is, I believe, very widely deplored. But it is one which cannot be remedied in an Education Bill, since the remedy is only to be achieved by a fundamental alteration of all our long-standing and numerous Local Government laws. This is a matter which is not within the province of the Board of Education.

*MR. LEIF JONES: Will the hon. Gentleman consider the desirability of establishing directly elected ad hoc authorities on which women would be eligible for election on the same terms and by the same electors as men?

MR. LOUGH: That would require a great alteration in the present arrangements.

Wages on Government Contracts.

MR. O'GRADY: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether representations have been made to him respecting the conditions of employment in the wood working department of Messrs. Waygood and Company, London, contractors to His Majesty's Government, and who have recently erected lifts for the new War Office and other Government buildings; whether the representations prove that such conditions preclude members of the cabinet makers and joiners' trade unions from accepting employment from the firm in question; and, if so, what action he intends taking in the matter?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. HARCOURT, Lancashire, Rossendale): The facts referred to by the hon. Member have been brought to my notice. I have made an opportunity of bringing the representatives of the firm and the trade union together in conference. I have made representations to Messrs. Waygood which I hope may produce a solution of the difficulties which I trust will be of advantage to all those concerned.

The Ventilation of the House.

During Questions,

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) said he did not know whether the First Commissioner of Works was aware of the presence of sewer gas in the House. The same thing occurred yesterday. The air was in a poisonous state. Could nothing be done to purify it? He believed that on a previous occasion, when the same thing occurred, a short adjournment was moved and carried for the purpose of purifying the atmosphere.

MR. HARCOURT: I can tell the hon. Member what has happened. Steam tugs sometimes pass near the Terrace, where the intake of air is, and it occasionally happens that a barge laden with manure passes, and the impure air is taken in. I hope that in a few minutes the trouble will be removed.

MR. DILLON later asked the First Commissioner of Works if he could now make a statement with regard to the unpleasant incident in connection with ventilation to which his attention had been drawn.

MR. HARCOURT: Yes, sir. I went down to the Terrace at once, and was able to trace the offender. It was a barge of gas liquor being taken down the river for the disposal of the contents in the sea. The same barge passed down at the same time yesterday, and gave rise to a similar complaint. I will endeavour to make arrangements with the gas company to adopt some other hour.

Morningside Asylum.

MR. STEWART (Greenock): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he will now make further inquiry into the circumstances attending the escape and recapture of the lunatic Patan, and his attack on Ex-Bailie Mitchell, at Greenock, on May 18th, in view of the unsatisfactory statements of the Morningside Asylum authorities, which traverse the explicit declarations of Superintendent Christie, Sergeant Cunningham, and Constables M'Aulay and Cameron, of the Greenock police, to the effect that, on his arrest, Patan was wearing institution clothing; and if, as stated by theMorningside Asylum officials, they were ignorant of the fact that the lunatic Paton was in correspondence with Captain Angus, Mr. Mitchell, and other prominent Greenock citizens, whether he will inquire into the neglect on the part of the asylum authorities in allowing dangerous lunatics to correspond with the outside world without the censorship, supervision, or even knowledge of the asylum officials.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. SINCLAIR, Forfarshire): I have made further inquiries, and am informed that Paton was wearing institution clothing when he escaped and when he was brought back. No letters from him to Captain Angus, Mr. Mitchell, or other Greenock citizens were seen by any asylum official or known to have been sent from the asylum. It is quite impossible to prevent patients who are so far sensible and acute in mind from getting letters posted in a modern asylum. About 300 visitors come every week to see their relatives, and so letters are frequently sent out without the knowledge of the authorities. Paton was not put in admission papers as a "dangerous lunatic," and had never assulted anyone at the asylum. Recently he was a good deal better mentally in some respects.

MR. STEWART: Will the right hon. Gentleman censure the authorities of the asylum for having put him in possession of information which was contrary to the facts?

MR. SINCLAIR: I will compare the two Answers, and if there is ground for censure, there shall be censure. I think, however, there was a misunderstanding about the description of the clothing. I shall be glad to confer with the hon. Member.

Scottish Teachers' Pensions.

MR. CROMBIE (Kincardineshire): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether, pending the Amendment of the Teachers Superannuation Act, he will allocate a part of the money which falls to the Scottish Education Department as the equivalent of grants made to England, to supplement the pensions of those teachers who have been retired since the introduction of the Superannuation Act.

Mr. SINCLAIR: In view of the fact that in the Teachers Superannuation Act, Parliament has seen fit to prescribe specifically the conditions and amounts of pensions to teachers, it would not be proper to apply public monies to this purpose except in terms of the Act dealing with the subject.

In reply to Mr. Cathcart Wason,

Mr. SINCLAIR said the Department in this matter were acting on precedent. There was no real method of dealing with it except by legislation.

Mr. CATHCART WASON: That is exactly what we are asking for.

Irish Land Purchase—Judicial Agreements.

Mr. GINNELL (Westmeath, N.) had given notice of the following Question, the answering of which was postponed: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that some landlords are, for the purpose of obtaining public money under the Land Act of 1903, by means of agreements called judicial, but never approved by any Court, eluding inspection and selling within the zones of that Act holdings to which the Land Acts, used legitimately, do not apply; and, seeing that embarrassed tenants will not voluntarily expose this practice, will the Estates Commissioners ascertain the date of such an agreement in every case, disallow all signed since 1902, and have the holdings inspected as non-judicial.

Mr. KILBRIDE (Kildare, S): When inspectors inspect these estates, is their attention directed to the necessity of ascertaining whether or not the tenants are in arrear with their rents, and whether they are free agents, or acting under duress?

Mr. BRYCE: If the hon. Member will look at the rules he will see what the instructions are on this point.

Barrow (Fenit) Tenants Grievances.

Mr. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that injury is done at Barrow, Fenit, to the houses and lands of purchased tenants by drifting sand; whether, if nothing can be done to protect these tenants, they will still be compelled to pay the annuities for their holdings, which are considerably reduced in value; and whether another independent engineer will be sent to report on the matter.

Mr. BRYCE: It appears to be the fact that a certain amount of injury has been caused by drifting sand to the holdings of two or three tenants at Barrow who have purchased under the Land Acts, but, as I informed the hon. Member on Thursday last,† there are no funds at the disposal of the Government which could properly be applied to abating the evil. The case appears to be one in which the tenant purchasers themselves should endeavour to devise a remedy. I have no objection, however, to ask the Board of Works if they could have the place examined by their engineer, with the object of assisting the tenants with advice, but it should be clearly understood that no other assistance may be counted upon. The Land Commission consider that they are legally bound to continue collecting the annuities.

Mr. THOMAS O'DONNELL: As a considerable area of land has been covered by sand, cannot some reduction be made in the annuity?

Mr. BRYCE: That is a question for the Land Commissioners to determine. I do not think much land is covered by sand.

Loans for Artisans' Dwellings.

Mr. THOMAS O'DONNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that urban authorities who want to borrow money for the building of aritsans' dwellings have to pay interest at the rate of 4 per cent. for forty years, and 4¼ for fifty years, exclusive of sinking fund, with the result that it is impossible for urban authorities in Ireland, without overburdening the rates, to effect any large improvement in the housing accommodation for the artisan and working classes; and whether, seeing that while land has been relieved of a portion of its local taxation under the Act of 1898, the whole of the landlords' share, no relief has been given in towns, and in view of the rates paid in Irish towns, the need for better and cheaper housing accommodation, steps will be taken to enable urban authorities to borrow money for housing at the same rate as it is proposed to be loaned for the building of agricultural labourers' cottages.

MR. BRYCE: I understand that the rates now charged for loans to local bodies are such as are necessary to keep the local Loans Fund self-supporting, and these rates have not been found so high as to deter local bodies from embarking on extensive schemes for new artisans' dwellings. I am informed that the Board of Works are still making loans for the purpose both to local authorities and private companies, and although the Board impose a limit on the rents which may be charged for the houses, they are aware that the schemes promoted by the latter class have proved remunerative. I have already indicated that it is the intention of the Government at a convenient opportunity to consider whether any Amendments of the law relating to the housing of the working classes in the towns of Ireland may be necessary. I cannot at present, as I have already told other hon. Members, make any more definite statement on the subject.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL: Would it not be possible by a Departmental arrangement to reduce the rate of interest to 3 per cent.

MR. BRYCE: I could not answer that Question without first communicating with the Board of Works and the Treasury.

Agricultural and Technical Schemes.

MR. GINNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland will the Return of Local Contributions to Agricultural and Technical Schemes be available for hon. Members before the Vote is taken for the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction.

MR. BRYCE: The distribution of copies of the Return in question is not a matter for which I am responsible, but I have ascertained from the Department concerned that copies will be distributed in the course of the day.

Untenanted Lands.

MR. GINNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland to state by whom is the material for the Return of Untenanted Land being collected; what precautions are taken to make the Return full and accurate, and especially to verify an owner's assertion that any particular land is demesne or is tenanted, when prima facie it is neither; and can he now fix the date at which the Return will be ready.

MR. BRYCE: The Return in question is being prepared by the Commissioner of Valuation from the valuation lists for the present year, in which the area and valuation of every agricultural holding in Ireland is set out. The Commissioner informs me that every care is being taken to make the return accurate and complete, and he anticipates that it will be finished by the end of the present month.

Tinned Meats in Irish Public Institutions.

MR. HALPIN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, considering the facts that have come to light regarding imported tinned meats, and the danger attaching to the use of the same, he will give instructions to all the public institutions under his control to discontinue the use of the said meats, which is one of the chief causes of the abnormal death rate from consumption in the British Isles and the spreading of diseases unknown before the establishment of the foreign tinned-meat trade.

MR. BRYCE: Without offering an opinion upon the point raised in the concluding part of the Question, I may inform the hon. Member that tinned meats are not used in Irish prisons. The management of district lunatic asylums is vested in committees of the county councils, and I am informed that tinned meats do not appear in any of the fixed dietary scales of these institutions. As regards workhouses, the Local Government Board are of opinion that boards of guardians in Ireland may safely be relied upon to take proper precautions as to the use of tinned meats, but, as a matter of fact, this class of food is not used to any appreciable extent in Irish workhouses.

MR. HALPIN: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman that if tinned meats are to be used in the public institutions under his control he will give instructions to have the pure unadulterated tinned meats of Shaw and Denny, of Limerick, advertised for by these institutions? Then the poor inmates could be certain that no human flesh would be mixed up with their food. [Laughter.]

MR. BRYCE: I think I have informed the hon. Member that I did not think tinned meats were being used, at any rate to any extent, in the institutions to which he alludes, nor do I believe to any considerable extent in the institutions under the local authorities.

Drumtullagh National School.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in 1905 a site was secured for a teachers' residence in connection with Drumtullagh national school, county Antrim, that the manager of the school applied to the Board of Works for a loan to erect the residence, that the application was accepted on the conditions that the vesting order be deposited with the Board, which is impossible until the estate from which the site has been granted is sold; and whether, in view of the fact that years may elapse before the estate will be sold, and that the Board of Works have accepted sureties for the loan, he will order it to be granted forthwith.

MR. BRYCE: This Question should be addressed to my hon. friend the Secretary to the Treasury, who answers for the Board of Works.

Manchester Estate Evicted Tenant.

MR. SLOAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. Collen, who purchased by auction an evicted holding on the Manchester estate, on March 25th, 1904, communicated to the Estates Commissioners his willingness to surrender the holding with the view of having the evicted tenant reinstated; and whether, in view of the fact that eighteen months have elapsed since the Commissioners promised to send their inspector to examine the farm, and that they have not yet done so, he can explain the cause of such delay.

*MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners have been informed by Mr. Collen that he is willing that Samuel Bainey, the evicted tenant referred to, should be restored. Proceedings for the sale of the estate upon which the holding is situate are before the Commissioners, but the turn of the estate for inspection has not yet come. When the estate is being inspected, the Commissioners will have the holding inspected and reported on.

MR. SLOAN: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say the time has not come for inspecting this particular estate?

*MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners are tremendously overworked, and they are obliged to take the estates in a certain order; if they departed from that it would be unfair to the other applicants. They will deal with this case directly they can.

Road Accommodation at Boyle.

MR. O'DOWD (Sligo, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the district of Chasefield, situate near Kilfree Junction, Boyle, forms a portion of the De Frene, county Sligo, estate, purchased some time ago by the Congested Districts Board, and that the poor inhabitants of this congested district are in a deplorable condition owing to want of road accommodation; whether he is aware that the Board's engineer, Mr. Dodd, visited the place, and, seeing the urgency of the case, had a road opened and work started on August 4th, 1905, which work was, ten days after, abruptly abandoned and never since resumed, notwithstanding representations since made to the Board; and, if so, will he state why the operations were discontinued, and when work will be resumed on this road.

*MR. BRYCE: The Congested Districts Board were unable to proceed with the proposed road on the De Freyne estate in consequence of objection made by a tenant through whose holding the road was to pass. When the estate becomes vested in the Board, they will have power to overrule the tenant's objection and proceed with the work.

Earl Fitzwilliam's Tenants.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is a fact that any and, if so, how many of the tenants who have signed agreements to purchase their holdings from Earl Fitzwilliam have been legally proceeded against because of their failure to pay the interest due on the amount of the purchase money; and, if so, whether the Estates Commissioners have made any inquiry into the solvency of those tenants and into their ability to pay the instalments when the sales to them are completed.

*MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that out of 655 tenant purchasers on the estate referred to who were liable to interest on the purchase money to November 1st last, all have paid save four, against whom proceedings are pending. The Commissioners make due inquiries into the security for the advances and into the means of the tenants in all cases which do not come within the zones.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state how many of the 1,055 tenants who have agreed to purchase their holdings from Earl Fitzwilliam were first-term tenants, how many were second term tenants, how many were non-judicial tenants, and how many of them were non-judicial tenants on January 1st, 1903; and whether any, and, if so, how many signed agreements out of court to become judicial tenants within twelve months previous to the date upon which they signed agreements to purchase.

*MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that of the 1,055 cases mentioned 189 were cases in which judicial rents were fixed or agreed to prior to August, 1896, 754 were fixed or agreed to since August, 1896, and 112 were cases of non-judicial rents. The Commissioners could not, without a detailed examination of the 1,055 agreements, state how many of the tenants were non-judicial on January 1st, 1903, or how many signed agreements out of court to become judicial tenants within twelve months previous to the dates upon which they signed agreements to purchase. Such an examination would involve a great amount of labour and much of the time of the staff to the delay of other current business, and the Commissioners do not consider that any result commensurate with the labour involved would be attained.

Massy Estate, Macroom.

MR. SHEEHAN (Cork County, Mid.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to the circumstances which exist on the Massy Estate, Macroom, and which have so far hindered and hampered all efforts at negotiation for purchase on behalf of the tenants; is he aware that Mr. W. H. H. Massy, who had a life interest in the estate, parted with it under deed, dated January 9th, 1899, to his brother, Mr. J. B. W. Massy, and that he now receives an annual income from the latter of £550, to be increased on the death of an annuitant, and that there is a dispute between the brothers as to who should receive the bonus in the event of a sale taking place; and will he state whether this is a case in which the Estates Commissioners could exercise their intervention under the recent regulations of the Lord-Lieutenant with a view to arranging the difficulty which exists between the owners.

*MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that they are not aware of the matters alleged in the Question, nor have they been approached on behalf of the tenants of the estate referred to. It would appear from the Question that the difficulties in arranging a sale are caused by differences between the owners themselves, and not by differences between the owners and the tenants, and it does not appear to the Commissioners that they can take any steps in the matter at present.

Largydonnell Land Case

MR. DOLAN (Leitrim, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have yet reached a decision regarding the holding of Patrick McGlone, of Aghanlish, Largydonnell, county Leitrim, which they compelled him to sell to them at a price which is 38½ years purchase of the rent fixed by the county court judge.

*MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that the reply is in the negative. They are considering the legal questions involved. They wish it to be added that the statement in the Question does not, in their view, correctly describe the position.

Labourers Acts Loans.

MR. FFRENCH (Wexford, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieuutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Wexford County Council at their last meeting passed a resolution suggesting that the rate of interest on existing loans should be revised, so that unions which loyally worked the Labourers' Acts in the past would repay the instalments on these loans on the same terms as those provided by the new Bill; and whether he can hold out any hope that he will be able to see his way to amend the Labourers' Bill in the direction indicated in the Resolution.

*MR. BRYCE: I am afraid that it would not be possible to adopt the suggestion contained in the Resolution referred to, but the matter is one for the Treasury rather than for me, and if the hon. Member wishes to put any further questions on the subject, I think he had better address one of the Ministers representing that Department.

Inspectors of Lunatics' Reports.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin County, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland when the Report of the inspectors of lunatics will be laid upon the Table; and whether he is aware that latterly such Reports have not been issued until after the rising of Parliament, so that there is no opportunity of referring to them when the Estimates are under discussion.

*MR. BRYCE: The Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums inform me that they hope to present their Report in the course of the coming month. The delay which has occurred in preparing the Report in recent years has been due to the difficulty of obtaining the necessary financial Returns from the various asylums. The inspectors have now made arrangements under which the financial Returns to be included in their annual Reports will relate to an earlier period than heretofore, and they anticipate that they will be able to present their Reports without delay in future.

Killavallen (Cork) Schoolhouse.

*MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Cork County, N.E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will explain the cause of delay, on the part of the Commissioners of National Education, Ireland, in taking into consideration applications for building grants for the erection of schoolhouses, having regard to the fact that many old schoolhouses are in a dilapidated condition, and have been condemned by the inspectors of the board; whether his attention has been called to the condition of the schoolhouse at Killavallen, county Cork, concerning which an inspector reported to the Board of National Education, six years ago, that the building was positively dangerous, and to the fact that although the manager, at the urgent request of the Board, has provided a site for a double schoolhouse, and made an application in due course for a building grant, he has been recently informed that the Board are not in a position to further consider his application; and whether, seeing that the state of this schoolhouse is such that it will require to be closed on the approach of winter, he will represent to the Board of National Education the necessity of making a grant in this case so that a new schoolhouse may be provided without further delay.

MR. BRYCE: The Commissioners of National Education inform me that they are aware of the unsatisfactory condition of the Killavullen schoolhouse, and that the site provided by the manager for a new building has been approved by the Commissioners and the Board of Works. The general question of building grants has not yet been definitely settled, but the Irish Government are prepared to recommend urgent cases, such as that of Killavullen, to the favourable consideration of the Treasury, without waiting for a settlement of the general question; and I will communicate further with the Commissioners on the subject with the object of arranging that this case may at once be dealt with.

MR. DILLON: Arising out of that answer may I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether in his opinion this most vital question will ever be settled. It has now been the subject of communication between the Board of Education and the Treasury for more than six years, and although we have been repeatedly promised a settlement, it has not yet been reached.

*MR. BRYCE said he had given great attention to this matter for a very long time, and very substantial progress had been made towards a settlement.

Cornamona School Teacher.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether a principal teacher in the, Cornamona national school, county Galway. is on the records of the Commissioners of National Education as Michael O'Malley, son of Thomas O'Malley and Catherine O'Malley, of Kilmilkin, although the same individual was formerly two years monitor of the Leehane national school, at which time his official description was Michael John O'Malley, the son of Michael O'Malley and Sarah Joyce; and, if so, whether the Commissioners will institute an inquiry into the genuineness or otherwise of the birth certificate which was submitted by the said Michael O'Malley when he made application for the position of principal teacher.

*MR. BRYCE: The Commissioners of National Education inform me that the recorded name of the teacher of Cornamona boys' national school is Michael O'Malley, and that they have recently received a complaint to the effect that this teacher produced at the time of his appointment a certificate of age which did not relate to himself. The matter is at present under inquiry by the senior inspector of the district.

Labourers' Cottage Schemes.

MR. SHEEHAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that there are some rural districts in Ireland, as for instance the Cork rural district, in which the councils have perfected and obtained the sanction of the Local Government Board to new schemes of labourers' cottages; and whether, in the interests of the labourers whose representations have passed the necessary inquiries and with a view to preventing a postponement of the building operations until the issue of a loan is authorised when the Labourers Bill becomes law, he will say whether he will include some provision in the Bill which would enable loans to be issued to councils in the position mentioned immediately on the Royal Assent being given to the measure.

MR. BRYCE: I am considering the question of the date upon which different parts of the Bill can be brought into operation, but I see considerable difficulty in adopting the hon. Member's suggestion, upon which, moreover, the Treasury would have to be consulted.

Irish Trade Statistics.

MR. BOLAND (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the statement on page 5 of the recent Consular Report from Chicago with reference to the system of consular invoices in force in the United States; and whether he will consider the advisability of adopting a similar system by way of experiment in Ireland, in view of the importance of the collection of reliable statistics of imports and exports, with a view to its permanent adoption in the United Kingdom should the system prove satisfactory.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I have seen the statement referred to. In order to carry out the experiment suggested by the hon. Member, it would be necessary that Foreign Consuls in Ireland and British Consuls abroad should be required to issue Consular Invoices for goods exported from or to Ireland. His Majesty's Government have no power to give directions of this kind to Foreign Consuls, and were it otherwise, I have great doubt if the introduction of a universal requirement of this kind would be popular among Irish exporters. As regards British Consuls abroad, I would point out that the principal object of Consular Invoices is not to shew ultimate destination but to ensure that goods are not undervalued for the purpose of assessment of ad valorem import duties. The introduction of the system therefore in respect of goods exported from places abroad to Ireland would not attain the object which the hon. Member has in view.

Rosslare Harbour.

MR. FFRENCH: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that, formerly, there were large sounding buoys placed at the approaches of Rosslare Harbour, and that those have been removed and replaced by much smaller ones that can scarcely be seen by navigators; and whether, seeing that within the past fortnight a steam yacht went aground on the banks owing to the captain not seeing the buoys, he will take steps to have the large buoys restored.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I understand from the Commissioner of Irish Lights that one automatic whistling lighted buoy was placed on the South Sheer, Rosslare, on April 20th, 1900, as an experiment. It was found impossible to keep this constantly alight, and the Commissioners removed it on March 1st, 1901, but without replacing it by any other seamark. I have already explained the objection to placing gas-lighted buoys here at the expense of the General Lighthouse Fund.

MR. FFRENCH: Can the right hon. Gentleman say why the buoys were removed and smaller buoys put in their place.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I have already given the hon. Member the explanation furnished to me by the Irish Lights Board—that it was found impossible to keep this constantly alight.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the seriousness of the matter, and that ships are frequently wrecked here, and cannot he have something done to have buoys put there ?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: The matter was seriously considered by the Irish Lights Board, Trinity House, and the Shipping Committee. Shipowners objected seriously to lights being placed there, and I should think that they were the people primarily interested, but they resisted very strongly. They resisted putting lights there at the expense of the Lighthouse Fund, and after going into the matter very carefully, it was considered that they had made good their case.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Will the right hon. Gentleman draw the attention of the Commission about to be appointed to the lighting of this particular harbour ?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I do not know that I can do that, but it will, of course, be open to the hon. Member to bring any evidence he may wish before the Commission. Indeed, I think it is one of the things that they would have to consider.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said that he hoped his hon. friend (Mr. Ffrench) would do that.

Killucan Postmaster.

MR. GINNELL: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if he is aware that the postmaster recently removed from Killucan was addicted to distributing proselytising tracts and leaflets; that a local cycling club was accustomed to follow him cleansing the public roads of this matter, and that his assistant and disciple is now a candidate for the vacant postmastership; and will he take care, before sanctioning a new appointment, that it shall not involve a further infliction of this character upon the people of the district.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: Careful inquiry at Killucan has produced no clear evidence of the truth of the statements that the late postmaster was addicted to distributing proselytising tracts and leaflets, or that any persons were accustomed to follow him about with the object indicated. In selecting an officer for the vacant appointment I shall of course consider the fitness in all respects of the candidates who apply.

The Crofters Acts.

MR. MORTON (Sutherland): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he can now say when the Bill to amend the Crofters Acts will be introduced.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling Burghs): I am afraid that I cannot have a definite date for the introduction of the Crofters' Bill.

Bodmin Election Petition.

SIR G. KEKEWICH (Exeter): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he will cause the notes of evidence and the text of the judgment of Mr. Justice Grantham and Mr. Justice Lawrance, in the case of the Bodmin Election petition, when laid upon the Table of the House, to be printed, and circulated to Members, so that they may have an opportunity of comparing the evidence and the judgments in the case of the Yarmouth and Bodmin Election petitions.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The report of the Bodmin Election petition has not yet been announced to the House by Mr. Speaker. I shall be quite willing if it is the desire of the House that the evidence and judgment in the trial of the petition should be printed and circulated among Members so soon as the Report has been received.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) asked the Prime Minister when the amendments to Clause 4 of the Education Bill proposed by the Government would be circulated. He desired to know what would be the distribution of Supply in the days yet remaining. That question was justified by the fact that the Government had intimated that they would restrict Supply this year to twenty days, which was the minimum, and not give the three extra days which had commonly, but not always, been given. He also expressed a hope that the right hon. Gentleman would be able to make arrangements which would prevent a repetition of the incident that had occurred that afternoon owing to the absence of Ministers at question time.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said he regretted the accident to which the right hon. gentleman referred. It was due to private business having been completed sooner than was the case earlier in the session. His right hon. friends would readjust their time-table. With regard to Supply, he would be able to give the right hon. Gentleman more accurate information on Monday. The papers with reference to Clause 4 of the Education Bill would be circulated to-morrow morning.

STANDING COMMITTEES (CHAIRMEN'S PANEL).

MR. STUART-WORTLEY reported from the Chairmen's Panel; that they had appointed Mr. Wason to act as Chairman of the Standing Committee for the consideration of Bills relating to Trade (including Agriculture and Fishing), Shipping and Manufactures, in place of Mr. Laurence Hardy; and had appointed Mr. Brynmor Jones to act as Chairman of the Standing Committee for the consideration of Bills relating to Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure, in place of Sir James Woodhouse, at the conclusion of the Workmen's Compensation Bill.

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS ESTIMATES, 1906-7.

REVENUE DEPARTMENTS.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum not exceeding £10,496,741, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on March 31st, 1907, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Post Office, including Telegraphs."

*THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar) said the most remarkable feature of the postal revenue at the present moment was the continued improvement which it had shown in every respect. He found that the excess of revenue from the various branches last year exceeded the estimate by about £670,000, and in the coming year the additional revenue derived from it was estimated at an excess of £800,000 over the previous year. The savings banks were also in a flourishing condition, and the number of depositors had increased. Their sheet-anchor was, of course, the penny stamp, and he was glad to say the revenue from that source was increasing month by month. The worst feature of the situation was the telegraph service. It had never been profitable, and now the telephone system had so largely taken its place that the revenue was falling off. The telephone system had made considerable progress, and the revenue derived from it was increasing rapidly year by year. The Post Office were pressing forward telephonic communication with various parts of the country, but they had great difficulty in obtaining wayleaves for the purpose. Not only did private individuals attempt to extort blackmail from the Post Office, but there was considerable difficulty with various local authorities. The Post Office had no desire to place overhead wires in places where they would be an eyesore; they were prepared to put the wires underground where necessary, and he hoped they would receive proper treatment from the local authorities. He hoped that the extension of wireless telegraphy as a commercial means of communication would take place rapidly. He expressed his surprise that the secretary of Lloyd's should have made a violent and unprovoked attack on the Post Office, and especially on his predecessor, in circulars on this matter which he sent to the newspapers and the Peers. All he could say with regard to the statement of the secretary of Lloyd's was that it was a pure travesty of the truth in regard to this matter. It was thought necessary to pass the Wireless Telegraphy Act to enable the Admiralty to control, in time of war, the stations that were being erected and to prevent the multiplication of stations to an extent that would interfere with the effective working of naval stations. The Act was also necessary to arm the Post Office with power to carry out any agreement that might be come to at any international conference which might take place. He understood that one of the chief objects of the Act was not to create a monopoly, but to prevent the monopoly which was gradually being created by one company's erecting stations at all the most suitable places. The only means of preventing that was to give the Postmaster-General power to license various companies and various systems. Since the passing of the Act only one additional licence had been granted to the Marconi Company, while ninety-one licences of various kinds had been issued, and only three licences had been refused. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had described him as a sturdy beggar for asking that a portion of the revenue should be applied to the postal service. He agreed that the Post Office ought to be a revenue-bearing portion of our system, but when there were additional profits the public ought to have some benefit from them. The cost of the various domestic postal reforms to be carried out and those which would follow the new Postal Union Convention, when it came into force, would amount to £156,000 a year and £190,000 a year respectively; in all a charge on the Post Office of £350,000 when they came into full operation. It was not easy in the present condition of things to find money for postal reform, but he thought the Committee would recognise that £350,000 a year in our present financial straits was no small sum for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give him for that purpose. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his Budget speech, had already referred to these proposals of domestic improvement, and he would only wish to supplement his right hon. friend's observations with a few words, and to indicate the nature of the reforms which he had been able to bring into operation. The first reform had reference to the charges for the Parcel Post, in regard to which he had introduced a new scale. The basis of that postage was a twopenny charge, with an additional penny a pound. What he had been able to do was to reduce the charge by a penny above the four pounds scale and by twopence in the upper scale from six pounds upwards. He confessed that that, of course, was only a provisional reform, and he thought it was generally acknowledged that the Parcel Post might very well be enlarged and improved, and possibly the charges at the lower end of the scale also reduced, and the upper scales extended. But he had no funds this year which would enable him to carry out that proposal. Then there was the question of reduction in the cost of postal orders, which formed in this country a very popular form of remitting money. No less than 95,000,000 postal orders were issued last year, and when he looked into the matter he found that the number of orders of the lower denominations of 2s. and 2s. 6d. amounted to 12,000,000, which was an indication, he thought, that they were largely used by people in humble circumstances. The present charge of 1d. on those orders represented a charge of from 4 to 4½ per cent. on their cost price. He proposed to reduce the rate on orders of this denomination from 1d. to ½d., and the rate on orders from 11s. to 15s. from 1½d. to 1d. He thought that would be a great boon to a very large number of users of postal orders. He had been pressed by his hon. friend the Member for Canterbury, and by other hon. Members to extend what might be called the commercial halfpenny post, so that any printed document or any document that was not of a personal character which did not exceed 2oz. might be sent for one halfpenny. The difficulty had always been one of definition, but what he proposed to do was to revise the definition as it existed at present, and to extend the benefits of this particular post. He did not suppose that all the anomalies and difficulties would be entirely overcome, but he hoped a good deal might be done to the advantage of the commercial firms, traders, and others who used this post. The reform to which he attached most importance was the increase of postal, telegraph, and telephone facilities. He was surprised to find that there was a certain number of misguided people in this country who desired to have their postal facilities increased. He was not one of those. He would rather like to have them very much diminished, though he dared say that if he had not got the facilities he would want them. With the money placed at his disposal he would be able to secure, except in regard to very distant places or very scantily populated neighbourhoods, to every house in this country the delivery of letters on at least three days a week. Then, at present, unless it could be shown that telegraph facilities were likely to be fairly profitable, or, at any rate, not to lead to any great loss, they were only granted under a guarantee that half the loss was borne by the individual of the locality, while the other half fell upon the Post Office, and in the case of the telephone the whole loss fell on the guarantor. In future, both in regard to telegraphs and trunk telephone lines, the guarantee would be reduced from one-half to one-third, and this, he hoped, would lead to an extension of these facilities to a large number of places where at present, unfortunately, they did not exist. He hoped, too, that this would meet the view of the Board of Agriculture as to the necessity of a cheap telephone service in rural and especially in fruit-growing districts. The improvements to which he referred would cost, as he had already stated, for a complete year, something like £156,000, and he thought he might claim that they would give relief which was very much needed, especially by the poorer classes, by the trading and commercial houses of the country and by the public at large. He was glad to think that the results of the Universal Postal Union Congress at Rome this year would be of considerable advantage to those who were interested in foreign postage. The hon. Member for Canterbury had urged upon him that at that conference he should have taken up an attitude of strongly pressing for a universal penny post throughout the world. His answer to that was a simple one, and perhaps it would appeal to hon. Members. He was personally sympathetic with the proposal that there should be a universal system of penny postage throughout the length and breadth of the world, and it was quite obvious that at some time or another that system would be introduced. It was equally evident that anomalies, such as that while they could send a letter from England to Australia for 1d., while it cost 2½d. to send a similar letter to Paris, did exist under the present system and must disappear. But the Government were not now in a position to deal with the question. Universal penny postage would involve this country in a loss of half a million sterling in postal revenue, and, as there would be practically no profit on the international penny postage, that loss would not be recouped, however largely the number of letters was increased as a result of the reduction. He thought the Committee would generally recognize that under present conditions the Government were not in a position to sacrifice £500,000 of revenue even for so laudable an object as that of universal penny postage. Even if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been in a position to offer him the £500,000 to play with, he was not sure that he should not have used it in other though perhaps less showy ways than in establishing universal penny postage. It would have been easy for the British delegates to make a demonstration in favour of the proposal for a universal penny postage if they had liked to do so, for when the Universal Postal Union Conference met, it was quite certain that a proposal for the establishment of the universal penny post would not have been carried and the Government could have professed to be in favour of it without involving the risk of any loss. But that would not have been, in his opinion, a satisfactory or honest way of dealing with the question, and therefore it was that he instructed the British delegates not to record their votes in favour of it. The British proposal at the Congress was that, failing universal penny postage, the initial charge of 2½d. should be reduced to 2d., and that, for every additional ½ oz. the charge should be 1d., instead of, as at present, 2½d. That would have meant that the charge for a letter weighing 1 oz. would have been reduced from 5d. to 3d. Both those proposals, he was sorry to say, were defeated, though they received the backing of all the English-speaking delegates and of some of the representatives of the other countries. However, largely as the result of the action of the British delegates, the initial weight of a foreign letter would be raised from ½ oz. to 1 oz., the charge remaining at 2½d.; while the charge for the second ounce would be 1½d. instead of 2½d., as at present. The upshot of the matter would be that, in future, they would be able to send a 1-oz. letter for 2½d. that formerly cost 5d., a 2-oz. letter for 4d. that formerly cost 10d., and a 3-oz. letter, which formerly cost 1s. 3d., for 5½d. He thought that would be regarded as a material relief to those sending letters abroad. Another result of these reductions would be that the difficulties connected with the question of enclosure would very largely disappear. The British delegates at the Postal Union Congress proposed under instructions from home that in regard to underpaid letters the fine should be limited to 1d., whatever might be the overcharge. It was an annoying matter when a letter had been not quite sufficiently stamped, very often owing to a mere accident, to find a heavy charge for overweight. The proposal of the British delegates was not carried. Under this new system, however, the fine for the underpaid letter would not be as it had been, 5d., but could not exceed 3d. As to the difference between the proposals now adopted and Imperial penny postage, he was not sure that on the whole the advantage from the point of view of the foreign letter writer would not be greater under the former. The initial charge would no doubt be more than at present, but when it came to anything exceeding 2 oz. the advantage lay on the side of the allowance of an increased weight in place of a mere reduction of charge. Moreover, universal penny postage would not have affected our relations with the Colonies in regard to Imperial postage, which was at present 1d. the ½ oz. But the reform adopted by the Congress of raising the unit weight had this advantage with regard to our existing system of Imperial penny post—that in future we should be able to send to our Colonies, and to any part of the British Empire for 1d. an ounce instead of only half an ounce; while two ounces would cost 2d. instead of 4d. Another reform adopted by the Congress was the "reply coupon." Anyone writing to a friend abroad and desirous of sending postage for a reply or a small remittance could do so by means of an international coupon. The total cost of the proposals would be £190,000 a year. He hoped that before very long some of that would be recouped by the increased number of letters sent. Imperial penny postage had now been extended to practically the whole of the British Empire. Bechuanaland and Rhodesia had come in during the last twelve months, and the system now extended throughout the Empire with the exception of one or two small islands in the Pacific. To his predecessor, whose absence from the House he regretted, really belonged the credit of a reduction in the price of porterage for telegrams and of another small reform. These were the proposals which the Department laid before the Committee, and he hoped they would be considered to be satisfactory. There were two other matters which were receiving his attention, but about which he was not in a position to say anything very definite. He hoped, however, that something might be done in the right direction. The first was a question which interested very much those who had directed their attention to the subject of Canadian postage—he meant the question whether we could give a material reduction on the postage of heavy articles, such as periodicals, magazines, and newspaper matter, in order to meet the American competition, which flooded Canada with American literature. He was in communication with the Canadian Government, and had made proposals and suggestions which he was sure they would meet in a friendly spirit, and he thought also in a favourable spirit. He hoped that before long some practical action might be taken. The second point was the question of reducing the postage on the literature for the blind. Every one had the greatest sympathy for the blind, and he was in negotiation with the Chancellor of the Exchequer and those interested with a view to such a reduction. All these matters were dealt with from the point of view of the public, but they must not forget that the Postmaster-General was the largest employer of labour in this country. He employed 150,000 persons, and indirectly he employed 50,000 persons apart from the men working under contractors. Therefore, his action, good or bad, must have a considerable influence on the general position of the labour market. His view was that the Government ought to be a good employer. As to contractors, the question was largely one of whether they paid fair wages and whether their conditions of labour were proper conditions. He had had the honour of moving and getting the House to adopt the fair wages clause, and he had consequently a parental feeling in regard to that clause. He had given a great deal of attention to any facts brought before him, where it was alleged that proper wages were not paid or that proper conditions were not observed, and he would continue to do so, in order that the Resolution of the House might be carried out with the fullest possible effect. He had been able in one or two cases to improve the conditions by drawing the attention of the contractors to them. The other day he gave notice of the termination of a contract because he thought it clear that the contractor was not, and never could be, a fair employer of labour. With regard to clothing contracts, the assent of the Treasury had enabled him to appoint an officer of the nature of an Inspector to be added to the Department, and for the first time the Postmaster-General would have an opportunity of more or less controlling the conditions of these clothing and other contracts or obtaining information as regarded them. With regard to the Department as a direct employer of manual labour, at Mount Pleasant and Holloway it was his anxious desire, and that of the Secretary and Controller, to place that work as far as possible on a stable basis, so that there should be the least possible fluctuations in regard to the work given out to these factories, and that there should not be a large number of men taken on at one time and discharged at another. Thus the men would be employed as far as possible from the beginning to the end of the year. The matter was not an easy one to arrange, but an endeavour was being made to carry it out. Referring to the Committee of Inquiry into the conditions and wages of postal servants, he said that the Committee was very much indebted to the members of that Committee, especially the chairman, for the great amount of time and attention they were giving to this important matter. As to the conditions of service, he thought the time had come when the full right of representation and combination ought to be allowed in the postal service as in other associations, and that there should be a reiteration of the right of appeal to the Postmaster-General. He believed that the stronger and more responsible a trade union was made the more likely were the relations between the trade union men and the employer to be good and satisfactory. Far from the recognition of postal trade unions leading to friction, he believed that the stronger and more representative the associations became the less would be the friction, and the more easy it would be to arrive at a conclusion satisfactory to both sides.

The last six months had been a period of exceptional pressure on the Department owing to the Committee of Inquiry, which took away the able Secretary and others for six or seven weeks, while reforms, special questions and memorials, deputations, etc., had consumed a large amount of time. In addition hon. Members themselves had something to do with the delay which took place in dealing with matters in which they were interested. He was informed a little while ago by his private secretary that in the ordinary way sixty or seventy applications of various sorts were made by hon. Members in the course of a calendar month, but that for some months past, in consequence perhaps of there being a new Government, a new Parliament, new Members, and a new Postmaster-General, the number of applications of all sorts had amounted to between 300 and 400 per month. This, he might say, was before there was an unfortunate vacancy in Glasgow, since when letters had been thick as leaves in Vallombrosa. He mentioned all this not as an excuse, but as an explanation of delay. He was not complaining of it at all, and he thanked hon. Members for the consideration which they always gave in these matters, and for not pressing him too severely. He wished to refer to the question of the appointment of sub-postmasters and medical officers. Ten years ago hon. Members had the direct power of appointing sub-postmasters, and so on. They had relinquished that power, but the position at present was that they had a certain power of recommendation to the Postmaster-General. It certainly seemed to him that the old system ought to be reverted to or this matter taken out of the purview of politics altogether. Having now been Postmaster-General for six months, he had formed a very high idea of the marvellous organisation and efficiency of our great postal service. Of course there were accidents, but when he told the Committee that last year no less than 4,700,000,000 letters and packages were sent throughout this country and no less than 100,000,000 trunk telephone and telegraph messages, the wonder was not at the number of complaints, but that they were not infinitely greater. He desired to recognise the zeal and public spirit that animated all branches of the service, of which he was proud to be the temporary chief.

*Mr. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) said the two important points which ought to engage the attention of the Committee, namely, the wages of postmen and universal penny postage, would not come up to-day because the postmen's case was now being considered by a Committee, and the question of universal penny postage would be discussed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Postmaster-General in the Grand Committee room on July 3rd, when a deputation would wait upon them. He promised the Postmaster-General that when the time arrived they would be able to show that the loss by the introduction of universal penny postage would not amount to more than £125,000 a year. Imperial penny postage, although strongly opposed by the right hon. Gentleman's predecessors, was carried. It was just the same in Rowland Hill's day, and it was found that no loss resulted from the introduction of the penny postage. He would show how little reliance could be placed on the brief prepared for his right hon. friend by referring to one matter. The right hon. Gentleman had told them of the blessings of increasing the weight of letters to foreign countries from a half ounce to one ounce. If the right hon. Gentleman would turn to Hansard of ten years ago when he asked the Postmaster-General of that time to increase the weight of letters to the Colonies and foreign countries from a half ounce to one ounce, he would find the reply was that a letter written on the strongest paper and in the strongest envelope could be sent for half an ounce to any part of the world, and it was not the intention to extend the weight to an ounce. To-day the right hon. Gentleman had referred in terms of praise to the benefits of the increase of the weight to an ounce. Surely after the insulting way in which the right hon. Gentleman's predecessors refused to increase the weight to an ounce there ought to be some sort o apology from the right hon. Gentleman for the attitude he took up to-day. No reliance could be placed on the figures supplied to the right hon. Gentleman as to the loss that would arise from the introduction of universal penny postage. He was prepared to show that the initial loss would not be a quarter of what the right hon. Gentleman said, and that the increase of letters in three years would cover the loss. The right hon. Gentleman had said that he had given £150,000 this year in concessions, but he omitted to tell the Committee at the same time that the Post Office made £480,000 extra profit. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the time had not arrived for selling post-cards at their face value. The loss would be very small. This was the only country in the world in which it was not possible to get the post-card at its face value. Another reform which he would like to see carried out was that telegraph money orders should be delivered at the residence instead of the recipient having to go to a post office to get the money. In every other country the reform he asked for had been carried out. In regard to this, and, in fact, to all money orders, it was far better for one postman to take the money to 200 houses of the addressees than for 200 persons to go to the post office for the money advised in each of their money orders. It would be an immense saving of time. He hoped hon. Members would join with him in pressing for that reform. Then there was the question of the cost of sending money abroad. To send 5s. to Paris from this country the cost was 4½d., but the cost of sending the same amount from Paris to this country was only one penny. Surely England could afford to send money abroad as cheaply as France, and he hoped a conference would be held with the French authorities upon this point. The only answer he had received on this point was that if £20 was sent it would be cheaper. There was another reform which had been received with great favour in Australia, America, and Italy. He referred to private letter boxes at post offices. In Sydney, Melbourne, New York, and even in Rome, a private letter box could be rented, where by applying his own key a person could get his letters at any hour. This country refused to give that facility to travellers from all parts of the world. Such a reform would answer a good purpose, and would be largely used by people in various parts of the Empire. The Postmaster-General had made a very curious admission with regard to the non-liability of the Post Office for anything which was stolen or any loss inflicted through the error or carelessness of the employees. He had told the Committee what a splendid staff he had, but he would like the right hon. Gentleman to adopt the practice which he would adopt in private life and when losses occurred to the public through gross carelessness or robbery pay his liabilities. To turn to another matter, this was the only country which refused to return a man a letter which he had posted in mistake. They insisted upon delivering it and refused to return it to the man who had written it. In every other country the moment a man sent a letter off by mistake he could go to the postmaster, and after furnishing the address and writing an account of the contents of the letter it would be returned to the writer. Often very serious injury had been done through mistakes of this kind, and he urged the right hon. Gentleman to allow writers of letters to withdraw them under those circumstances. There was another small matter which was causing great annoyance to a large number of persons, and that was the difficulty of buying stamps at railway stations. It was almost incredible that at the bookstalls they could not purchase a stamp. He was told by the great firm who controlled the bookstalls that it was owing to the excessive meanness of the Post Office that they could not get stamps at railway stations. If the Postmaster-General would look into this matter he should be much obliged. The right hon. Gentleman stated that he could not get any more money out of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but when a source of expenditure which was not justified was pointed out any business man would at once consider it, and put an end to it if possible. At the present moment they were losing £1,000,000 a year on the telegraph business. Every telegram that was dispatched cost the country 1s., whilst the average amount paid for it was only 7½d., which showed an absolute loss of 4½d. upon every telegram delivered. In round figures 90,000,000 telegrams cost £4,500,000, and the money received for them was £3,500,000. Would any business man tolerate this enormous loss upon telegrams? He was a little worried when he heard his right hon. friend express such sympathy for postmasters, because he thought the time had arrived for putting an end to political patronage. In the great colony of Australia on the railways they had a Civil Service board irremovable as judges, and Members of Parliament had no right to make or interfere with promotions. He thanked the Committee for listening to him so patiently.

MR. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) congratulated the Postmaster-General upon the interesting speech he had made. He rose to say a few words in regard to the interests of the employees who carried out the work of the Post Office in the admirable way he had described. As regarded their religion there was no interference from the Postmaster-General, but it was only as regarded their blood that the Postmaster-General seemed to think he had the right of interference, and to say what kind of blood should flow in their veins. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that it was for the good of the country that all his employees should be vaccinated, and he would, therefore, call his attention to a few figures which might make him consider whether it was necessary to interfere with the liberty of those who served under him. In the smallpox hospital where he lived there had been admitted 577 cases, and of these 509 were vaccinated. No one looking at those figures could say that vaccination was a safeguard against smallpox. One of these people had been re-vaccinated three times, another four times, and another five times. He believed there were some people who were re-vaccinated every six months, but they were not all like the pauper who, when a doctor offered him a shilling if he would allow himself to be vaccinated, replied: "Yes, you may vaccinate the whole of my body at that rate." They usually valued their skins at a little more than one shilling a square inch, and the Post Office employees valued their skins more highly than that. Vaccination was absolutely useless. If the hon. Member for the Epping Division who laughed would give him two or three hours of his valuable time he would undertake to convert him. He knew the hon. and gallant Member was a man of intelligence. He would offer him £10——

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend): Is it in order for a Member of this House to offer a bribe to another?

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: I do not think it was serious.

MR. LUPTON: I will hand him £10——

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: Oh, leave that.

MR. LUPTON: I am sorry the rules of the House will not allow me to finish my sentence.

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: No, you must not.

MR. LUPTON: I am sorry because it leaves me at a disadvantage. It prevents me making an explanation, and that half-sentence will go into the Press because I must not finish a sentence. People said, he continued, that in Germany they had wiped out smallpox by vaccination. In six years there were eighty-eight deaths in London from smallpox and in Berlin in the same period fifty-one.

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: Order, order! On the Post Office Estimates we cannot have a discussion on the general question of vaccination.

MR. LUPTON said he could not trace the history of all Post Office officials, but he could trace the history of men in the Army, and he thought he was entitled to take statistics from the Army to show the effects of vaccination.

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN said the hon. Member was out of order in discussing the general question of vaccination.

MR. LUPTON said he bowed to the ruling of the Chair, but what he wished to say was that the Postmaster-General could order vaccination if he liked, and he submitted he was entitled to raise the question of whether vaccination was of any use or not.

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: The question must be raised by itself, but the general question of vaccination is out of place on the Post Office Estimates.

MR. LUPTON said that if vaccination was shown to be useless in the Army it must be useless in the Post Office. He supposed he was in order in saying that. In the last twenty-eight years, of 3,953 vaccinated soldiers 10 per cent. had died of smallpox. If they died in the Army in that ratio they would die in the same ratio in the Post Office. The hon. Member was proceeding to quote instances of the effects of vaccination when—

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: I have already said that we cannot have a general discussion on vaccination. The hon. Member must limit himself to vaccination in the Post Office and its effect upon Post Office officials.

MR. LUPTON: No statistics are published as regards smallpox in the Post Office.

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: Then there is no use referring further to the matter.

MR. LUPTON said he would content himself by asking the Postmaster-General to inquire into the question of vaccination and smallpox, and if he came to the conclusion that vaccination was useless he should revise the existing orders on the subject. The right hon. Gentleman might alter his regulations so that vaccination would only be compulsory if he thought it was necessary at all in the case of a severe epidemic. His opinion was that vaccination was no use at all.

MR. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.) said he wished, as having been connected with the Local Government Board for some time, to protest against the remarks of the hon. Member for the Sleaford Division. The hon. Member had said that the Postmaster-General should only make vaccination compulsory in the Post Office in the event of a severe epidemic. He protested against that because nothing could be more disastrous to the service. He wished to draw attention to a subject which created a good deal of interest, but which had found very slight advocacy in the Committee. They had had a very interesting review by the Postmaster-General of the work of the Post Office for the year, and about the necessity for cheap Imperial postage, but while with the greater part of the world the postal arrangements were admirable and in this country the service rendered by the Post Office was of a character they had a right to admire, he was sorry to say that in many rural districts the condition of things was very bad. He knew of places which were well provided with railway communication, and contained a large population, where the postal arrangements were very far from what they ought be. He had drawn attention to this matter repeatedly, but his representations had met with very meagre results. In many parts of the country the postal service arrived at a late hour in the morning, and the delivery took place at from half-past three to half-past four. Of course that did not affect the people who were able to keep carriages and servants, and could send for their letters; but the poorer people, the farmers and small traders, were very seriously inconvenienced by the want of adequate postal facilities. There were many farmers in the country who were seriously hampered in carrying on their business owing to their letters arriving after they had gone to the market, or to the neighbouring towns on business. They found on their return that their letters had arrived, but the post had left, and it was next morning before they were able to reply to their communications. Of course, the Postmaster-General had great difficulties to face but he submitted that in many cases a great improvement might be effected by a re-arrangement of postal facilities. In certain districts local circumstances had altered. New railways had come into existence, and it would be quite easy by an alteration of the postal centres to afford the facilities asked for. He did not suggest that there should be the same number of deliveries as in the towns but he submitted that there should be an arrival of letters early in the morning and a collection late in the evening. At present a man in Manchester who spent 1d. on a letter got all the facilities he could desire, and an adequate return for the expenditure, but in the country districts a man did not get the same value for 1d. spent on a letter. He did not ask the Postmaster-General to say anything on the subject that day, but he asked him to give his earnest attention to this question so that all these difficulties might be overcome.

MR. SEDDON (Lancashire, Newton) said he wished to express his thanks to the Postmaster-General for his remarks with reference to the Post Office employees. The attitude of the right hon. Gentleman was not only the correct one, but stood out in strong relief against that of his predecessor. Personally he did not share the regret expressed that the late Postmaster-General was not present to criticise or to commend the statement for the current year. He had no desire to see that Gentleman in the House, and he did not regret the small part he had played in trying to keep him out. He did not think it was in the interests of the public service for any paid official, even a Cabinet Minister, to describe a section of the community as blood suckers and blackmailers. Until he had learned better manners he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would keep out of the House. He noticed that £580,000 was paid last year to contractors for carrying the mails by road, and he was told that in these cases the Post Office did not own the vans or have any control over the men. The result was that the men were paid low wages and worked long hours under unsatisfactory conditions. In the Post Office it had been demonstrated beyond all doubt that the employment of direct labour was efficient, economical, and in the public interest. Yet there was this enormous amount paid to contractors. Electric traction had passed out of the experimental stage, and the money now paid to contractors would pay three per cent. on something like £20,000,000. Surely this was a favourable opportunity for encouraging British industries by setting up a great motor carriage service to be worked by the Post Office. The Post Office was now sympathetic towards direct labour employment. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to extend the operation of the principle and to secure the employment by the Post Office of as much direct labour as was possible. That would be, he held, an economy to the nation and a benefit to the workmen engaged.

SIR GILBERT PARKER said there were two Reports to which he wished to refer for a few moments. In the last Parliament there was a considerable body of opinion, on both sides of the House, as to the action of postal servants in bringing pressure to bear on Members of Parliament in regard to their grievances. In order to prevent the recurrence of that pressure he advocated the appointment of a permanent Commission, which should from time to time survey the changed conditions of industrial life and the alterations in its standards in regard to wages and living. The Commission should deal not only with the Post Office or any other Department but with the conditions prevailing in every Department contrasted with those existing in civil life. It was true that at the present time a Committee had been appointed to inquire into this question as it affected the grievances of postal servants, but he regretted that the late Postmaster-General did not appoint, as he might have done, a permanent Commission which, if its constitution was satisfactory, he believed would have the support and confidence of both Parties. It should be representative of labour as well as of the other wide interests concerned. He appealed to the present Postmaster-General to take into consideration the question of bringing before Parliament the desirability of appointing a permanent Commission to deal with wages and conditions of service of Civil servants not only in the Post Office but in all Departments of State He thought that would satisfy the minds of those who were uneasy and alarmed about these grievances. The Postmaster-General had given promises in regard to some reforms which had been pressed upon him by a great many Members of the House of Commons, but he had not given any definite pledge as to the reduction of the postal rates between this country and Canada. Last year a deputation consisting of twenty-one Members of Parliament waited upon the late Postmaster General and begged him to initiate a reform which would give to Canada that consideration to which she was entitled in regard to this very serious matter. The question had not been discussed for two or three years, and it was well worth going over the ground which had been traversed before, in order that a new House of Commons might understand the position. He was quite sure that there was not a Member of the House who did not desire the closest and most sympathetic relations between this country and the Colonies, and he was sure that there was no one who would not give reciprocal relations which did not involve any change in our fiscal system. He had nothing to do with the fiscal system of this country in regard to this question, and therefore he claimed the sympathy of his hon. friends opposite. At the present time periodicals and magazines going from this country to Canada had to be paid for at the rate of 4d. a pound, whereas periodicals going from the United States to Canada were paid for at the rate of a halfpenny a pound That being so, anyone interested in the industrial developement of this country and the developement of trade between ourselves and our Colonies must realise what a serious condition of things this was, because a magazine coming from the United States was filled, and purposely filled, with advertisements of American goods. Another serious thing was that there were fifty-five periodicals published in America to one published in Canada. Therefore, Canada was swamped with American literature which represented the commercial and social life of the United States and dealt with the attitude of Canada as a Colony towards this country. This constant influx of American literature and its influence in Canada tended to devitalise the loyalty of the Colony. That process had been going on year after year, and if they could devise a reform of the Postal Department—which was the milch cow of the Government far more than any other Department—without any undue pressure upon the resources at the disposal of the right hon. Gentleman, he thought it ought to be done. A sixpenny monthly English magazine cost 9s. 6d. a year in Canada, whereas an American magazine only cost 6s. 6d. That was a differential rate which effectually excluded English magazines and literature from Canada, except English magazines which were imported in bulk into the United States at a cost of 8s. per hundred pounds or about a penny a pound. When these magazines arrived in America, however, they had added to them about a hundred or a hundred and fifty pages of American advertisements. All this had a tendency to diminish the commercial interchange which should go on between this country and Canada, and to decrease the output of the industrial centres of this country. At present the Nineteenth Century, weighing ten or twelve ounces, cost 4½d. to send from London to Liverpool, whereas the quarterly issue of the Gentlewoman or of The Drapers' Record, weighing two and a half pounds and containing 130 pages of advertisements, and sixty-four pages partly advertisement and partly reading matter went through the post from London to Liverpool for a halfpenny. He called the system a stupid one, but when he put the matter before the late Postmaster-General almost a couple of years ago the right hon. Gentleman said that the publishers of certain publications took advantage of the Post Office Act, and so brought about the anomalies of which he complained. Of course if a proposal was made to remove anomalies of this kind it would receive opposition on the part of the owners of these huge and successful newspapers which went by post for a halfpenny. If the rates on magazines like the Nineteenth Century and the Contemporary were lowered, a better class of reading matter would be provided. During the last few years there had been a tendency to lower the taste of the public by cheap newspapers and literature, and it was desirable that the movement in that direction should not be encouraged. He knew that the right hon. Gentleman was sympathetic in this matter. Canada had shown its willingness to meet this country by stating that they would lower the rate with regard to magazines and periodicals by a farthing, and they were making that concession upon international grounds. Canada, therefore, was trying to find a way out of the difficulty, and he hoped that the proposals which the right hon. Gentleman had made to the Government of that country were not of a nature which demanded too large a sacrifice. Successive Postmasters-Generals had always, with the whip of the Treasury snapped over their heads, opposed reforms which, when initiated, brought grist to the Treasury. So far as the telegraph department was concerned he was not prepared to offer any opinion. In view of the facts he had endeavoured to put before the Committee, and in view of the fact that there was a large body of opinion on both sides of the House in its favour, he thought the reply of the Postmaster-General with regard to Canada was most unsatisfactory. Canada was asking for the reduction of a penny on the postage rate on British magazines. She said that if we gave her that reduction she would be able to purchase more magazines of this country in order to compete with the great incursion of American magazines. But beyond the Imperial influence and solidarity throughout the Empire which these magazines would convey, there was the commercial and industrial interest. He believed the Postmaster-General could do nothing more popular, so far as Canada was concerned, and he believed so far as this country was concerned, than to adjust these anomalies in connection with the inland postage, and in adjusting them make it possible to reduce the rates to Canada. He relied on the right hon. Gentleman, first, to give the Committee as soon as possible the terms of the negotiations into which he had entered with Canada; secondly, to make the conditions as light as possible for her to accept; and, thirdly, not to consider too seriously the possible loss of revenue, because he must remember that he did not get so much out of the postage as he would expect, as the bulk of the reading matter that went to Canada went by way of the United States, which got the bulk of the postage. In conclusion, he appealed once more to the right hon. Gentleman to advance this most excellent cause as rapidly as possible.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) said it was obvious that the many topics which were usually discussed on these Estimates could not be entered into now because the Committee which was considering them had not concluded its deliberations. But there was one question, which was not under the consideration of the Committee, to which he desired to refer. It was the question of the wages and conditions of service of the mail van drivers. He had always held that the conditions of service of these men and the wages they received were a disgrace to the Service and to the country. He would give the Committee a typical case. A mail van driver started out at 6 a.m., worked till 10 a.m., returned at 2 p.m., and left off at 10 p.m. for a wage of 3s. 6d. a day.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: What is the name of the contractor?

MR. PICKERSGILL said he was unable to give the name of the contractor. But, in addition to those hours, the men had to attend on Sunday to clean their horses, harness and stables, for which they received no remuneration. He contended that no one who even indirectly was working for the State ought to be serving under such conditions. The right hon. Gentleman had told the Committee he had determined one contract because he was not satisfied with the conditions under which the men worked, but he would like to know what the right hon. Gentleman considered were fair and reasonable hours for a mail van driver, and what was a fair and reasonable salary. It appeared that at present the old Fair Wages Clause was incorporated in these contracts, but that was of no use, as long experience had shewn. He held the opinion that the Post Office ought to do its own cartage, but, until it did, he wished to press on the Postmaster-General very strongly that as the Fair Wages Clause had proved a failure, he ought to adopt the practice followed in many cases by the London County Council and other local bodies, of incorporating in these contracts a schedule of hours and wages. There was no difficulty in doing so. He felt very strongly upon this question, in which the people of the East End of London were largely concerned. But it was not only a question of workmen; the honour of the public and of this House was concerned. The men for whose conditions of service they were responsible should not be subjected to such conditions as those which he had stated, In order to elicit a fuller statement upon this very important and pressing question, he moved to reduce the Vote by the amount of which he had given notice, namely £100.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £10,496,641, be granted for the said service."—(Mr. Pickersgill.)

*LORD VALENTIA (Oxford) congratulated the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster-General upon being the first Minister occupying the position he held who had been able to see his way to grant a concession to his blind fellow countrymen, although he regretted the right hon. Gentleman was unable to state to the Committee what the concession was that he proposed to grant. All the Committee would share the sympathy exhibited by the right hon. Gentleman towards the blind. There were a great many people who did not realise that the blind had to suffer a considerable amount of hardship that more fortunate people had not to put up with. They had to pay as much rates and taxes as their more favoured brethren, but had not the opportunity of enjoying the amenities and advantages which those rates and taxes provided in the same way as those who had their sight. They had at great trouble, and after years of instruction, been taught to read with their hands, by a laborious but ingenious use of the sense of touch, to supplement the sense of which they are deficient; but after having been so instructed they found themselves still further handicapped by the price and the difficulty of getting the literature they required. The weight and bulk of literature for the blind was such as to make the cost of postage very heavy. The Postmaster-General had expressed his sympathy with the proposal, but he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would appreciate the value of the adage that a little help was worth a deal of pity. The blind were obliged to confine themselves to such magazines as "Progres," which cost 6d.: the price of transmission through the post amounted to 3d., and for some occult reason an additional 1d. was sometimes charged. These were instances of the expense of sending through the post literature available for the use of the blind. A more astonishing piece of information was furnished by the Secretary of the British and Foreign Blind Association who told him that the weight of the Bible in a form for the blind was 105 lbs., and the cost of postage per copy £1 0s. 5d. This seemed to him to make it prohibitive in many cases for blind people, who were not very largely endowed with this world's goods, to obtain literature of any kind through the post. The preferential rate given to newspapers was regarded with envy by the blind. Such papers as the Field, the Graphic, and the Queen were larger in bulk and wider than the magazine for the blind he had referred to, and yet they passed through the post for ½d.; the Drapers' Record, with 300 pages on one occasion, passed through the post for ½d., although it was six times as large as the small magazine to which he had referred. He was glad to think that the Postmaster-General proposed to mitigate the difficulties which the blind suffered with regard to literature sent through the post. He only hoped the concession would be really material. The Postmaster-General conducted one of the most efficient and best equipped of the Government Departments, and he was so far happily placed that his was one of the Departments which invariably swelled the revenue instead of depleting it as other Departments did. The right hon. Gentleman, therefore, could be liberal without falling foul of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and follow the example of various foreign countries and British Colonies by allowing literature for the blind to pass free through the post. He urged the right hon. Gentleman not to spoil the ship for a ha'porth of tar. Many proposals had been made to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make use of public money for the benefit of Members of Parliament. If the Committee were polled to decide the question whether the right hon. Gentleman should yield to any of those proposals to grant free postage for the blind, he would guarantee the right hon. Gentleman a larger majority than it had ever been his duty to tell in favour of the Government.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said he had nothing but admiration for the statement of the Postmaster-General, and, notwithstanding his right hon. friend's gentle remonstrance with regard to the importunity of Members, he ventured to bring before him a grievance affecting the whole of the north-west of Ireland—he referred to the mail service between Ireland and England. The mail service proper—viz., the service via Holyhead—was as good as it could be. Trains leaving Derry in the afternoon about 3 o'clock reached Kingston at 8 and London at 5.45 in the morning. But some time ago the merchants of Belfast asked for additional facilities via Greenore. After a good deal of fighting with the late Postmaster-General that boon was conceded, they securing a mail bag by the train leaving Belfast for Greenore. Of course that concession only whetted the appetite of the places left out. After another contest—he was on two deputations to the Postmaster-General—this boon was conceded to the city of Derry. That made the remaining places more clamorous. He submitted that the boon could be conceded to the other places without adding much to the cost and would entail absolutely no trouble to the Post Office officials. The train stopped at the stations and the postal officials were at the station with mails. It was a mystery how this could be denied. The invariable answer of the late Postmaster-General was that the amount of correspondence would not justify the increased cost. There would be little or no increased cost; and how did the Post Office know what the amount of correspondence would be before it had tried the experiment? He knew of one case in which a firm of linen merchants would send twenty or thirty more letters a day if they had this convenience. Why should the Post Office proceed in this piecemeal fashion, and having satisfied Belfast and Derry and shut off their pressure,, leave the other three or four towns on the route from Derry to Belfast to contend for this simple act? He had to acknowledge the exceeding courtesy of the right hon. Gentleman on many occasions, and he would now ask him to look into this matter afresh. It would not involve any extra charge on the Post Office, or any additional trouble.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Wapping) said he was anxious to take up the appeal of the hon. member for Gravesend for a concession to Canada in the matter of the postage on magazines. It was a subject on which Canada felt very deeply, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not merely give a sympathetic answer, but state what he was able to do. He looked upon the question not so much from the commercial point of view, though that was important, as from a regard for the wishes of Canada itself. Canada had made very great concessions to us and would welcome, no doubt, similar concessions from this side of the water. He was tired of hearing subjects put forward as being non-political, but he really thought that this question was non-political. Hon. Gentlemen opposite might have different opinions as to how an Imperial bond should be created, but he was sure they would be all ready to assist in pressing upon the right hon. Gentleman a concession of postage which would assist high-class magazines from this country to be spread throughout Canada. Then there was the question of mail carts raised by the hon. Member for Bethnal Green. He was not prepared to go into the question of the wages of the drivers, though he was inclined to think they were underpaid. Nor was he inclined to go so far as to suggest the impropriety of not having a State service of mail drivers. But he did hope the right hon. Gentleman would go into the whole question. Not only were the mail drivers paid as low as possible, but the animals they drove were of the worst possible kind, and a great deal of cruelty was shown in the class of animal that was placed between the shafts and the way in which it was driven. He was more inclined on this occasion to plead for the animals than for the men, for he was sure other hon. Members would look after the men but might be apt to forget the horses. Motor traction might be usefully employed to the great saving of the horses and men and time, and the greater convenience of the rural districts. The motor vans now used in London could be used also in the country districts with advantage. With regard to vaccination he thought the Postmaster-General was right in refusing to relax his rules. He heard with satisfaction that the guarantee in rural districts for post-offices was about to be reduced to one-third instead of one-half. That was a valuable concession, and one which would be a great benefit in the rural districts where the advantages of telegraphy were beginning to be more highly appreciated. He would also like to know how the employment of old soldiers as rural postmen was going on. Were such appointments on the increase or on the decrease? Had these old soldiers proved good servants, and had the new system of granting characters instituted a short time ago proved a success? He was painfully aware that in the old days the old system of characters was liable to abuse. Since that system had been abolished he knew of many good men who were out of employment, and he was naturally anxious that they should receive some consideration for the hardships they had undergone in their country's service. He would sooner have seen the 2s. and the 2s. 6d. postal orders left untouched, and the wages of the rural postmen increased.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON: That matter, of course, is before the Committee.

Colonel LOCKWOOD said that perhaps when the matter came up in a concrete form the right hon. Gentleman would see what could be done to assist the rural postmen, rural postmasters, sub-postmasters, and sub-postmistresses in the small country villages, who had such hard and responsible duties to perform, and whose remuneration was extremely small. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman would tell them that there were numerous applications for any of these positions under the Post Office, and that if there happened to be a sub-post office vacant he was overwhelmed with applications. That, however, did not affect the question that if a person did a certain amount of responsible work he should be paid a wage commensurate with that work. That, was the opinion of the majority in this House, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would remember that the class of employees he had referred to were extremely scantily paid. If he would also make some announcement in regard to Canada he would confer a great boon upon that Colony, and also upon the people of this country.

*Mr. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland) said he quite agreed with the sentiments expressed by the right hon. and gallant Member for the Epping Division in regard to sub-postmasters, postmasters and postmistresses. He knew the case of three young men in his district, one of whom had to travel nine miles out and back for 1s. 6d.; another travelled seventeen miles out and back for 2s.; and the third seventeen miles out and back for 1s. 9d. Those were entirely inadequate rates of pay, and while it might be perfectly true that men could be readily obtained, that was no reason why the Post Office should not pay more. They ought to see that a fair rate of wages was paid and set a good example as model employers. Many grievances had been put forward by hon. Members, but they all sank into insignificance beside the grievances of his constituency, which had been absolutely neglected under the new scheme. When he listened to the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer who spoke of the large sums of money which were going to be devoted to securing that every district should have at least three deliveries a week, he felt exhilarated, because he thought at last a brighter day was dawning in the north country. But those hopes which had arisen in his mind and in his constituency had all been dashed to the ground; they were as badly off as ever, and it now appeared that there was not the slightest idea of giving his constituency any portion of this large sum of money for postal reforms. At present the county of Shetland had only one direct mail a week, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would try to do something in the direction of remedying that injustice. The Post Office paid a large sum for their mail service, but he did not think that adequate steps had ever been taken to find out whether better value could not be got for their money than they were getting at the present time. There was only one direct mail service a week for the whole county of Shetland. They were only asking for two direct mails a week all the year round, and that they could not get. The county of Orkney had also its special grievance. The mail leaving London at 8 p.m., Inverness at 9.30 a.m., was due at Thurso at 3.30 p.m., and should arrive at Scapa, Kirkwall, before 8 p.m. Frequently the mails instead of arriving at 8 o'clock at night did not arrive until 11 o'clock, or sometimes later. In order to suit the convenience of the railway companies the right hon. Gentleman allowed the mails for a whole county to dawdle along at the sweet will of the railway companies. The Postmaster-General ought to take the railway companies by the throat, and let them know plainly that the Government would not allow them to treat thus not only the mail of the entire county of Orkney, but the mail of the greater portion of the county of Caithness. There had been in the past an unjustifiable detention of the steamer at Aithhole to pick up or drop the Laidlaw Factor or some shooting tenant. This privilege had been so abused that it had often caused great inconvenience. The predecessor of the right hon. Gentleman gave a pledge that this kind of thing would not be permitted to go on, and he hoped the Postmaster-General would see that that pledge was carried out to the effect that the mail steamer should not stop if it would cause delay of over ten minutes.

Another grievance to which he desired to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman had reference to the delivery of mails from Kirkwall to the North Isles. The straightforward and the cheapest plan would be to start at one point one day and to travel all that day until the destination was reached, and to return on the following day. The people in the districts served were perfectly satisfied that could be done. He admitted that the Post Office was paying a very large sum for the Orkney and Shetland service, but at the same time he maintained that where the public interest was concerned, all other considerations should be put aside at once. These matters were eally of vast importance to a considerable section of the community. The people who lived in distant parts were entitled to far more consideration at the hands of the Postmaster-General than those who lived merely in the suburbs of London. Referring to the delivery of mails on Sunday in Scotland, he said he was sure the Postmaster-General knew that the Scottish people were nothing if not Sabbatarians. He thought a considerable sum of money could be saved by discontinuing certain mail cart and foot services which were provided at present all over Scotland on Sunday, only for the purpose of delivering a few letters which might very well be delivered on Monday. Where he lived in Ayrshire mails were driven over sixty miles out and home. [AN HON. MEMBER: With one horse ?] With one horse, but changed at stages. This was not a question of horseflesh, but a question of breaking the Sabbath day and the incurring of unnecessary cost. If the right hon. Gentleman would put a stop to these Sunday deliveries he would do much to commend himself in the eyes of religious Scotland.

SIR A. ACLAND-HOOD (Somersetshire, Wellington) said he sympathised with the remarks of the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland, but perhaps he would be surprised to hear that some people who lived in Somersetshire, within 160 miles of London, were in the same position as those in the northern islands in respect to postal facilities. The case had been brought before the Post Office for many years, but little or no improvement had been made. Some of the farmers had their letters delivered four days a week, others three days a week, and others only two days a week. The hardship of this condition of affairs arose in this way. Most of these people tried to make a living by selling poultry, eggs, butter, and cream, and it was obvious that unless they could rely on getting orders in time they could not properly carry on their trade. Another way of living was by letting lodgings in the summer months, and in these days unless business men could get their letters and newspapers every morning they would not take the lodgings. The result was a serious loss of income to a certain number of his constituents. Another disadvantage was that stockbuyers who sent letters intimating their intention to visit farmers sometimes arrived before the letters were delivered. It might happen that the farmers had to send some miles off for the stock. He hoped the Postmaster-General would look into the matter. He knew the old argument was that such a service would not pay, but no one could say that it would not pay until it was tried. He had never agreed with the Post Office opinion that all services should bring an immediate profit to the State. The farmers and small traders paid rates and taxes, and they were quite as much entitled to a daily delivery of letters as the richer people who lived in other districts.

*Mr. MORTON (Sutherlandshire) asked who gave the instructions to the British representatives at the recent Postal Conference at Rome. These matters apparently were settled by the officials. He believed he was right in saying that the Postmaster-General was in favour of universal penny postage, but unfortunately the right hon. Gentleman had not much to say in the matter. It was a well known fact that the Post Office permanent officials were always against reform of any sort whatever. Every improvement in the postal system of this country for the last hundred years, including penny postage, had had to be forced on the officials from the outside. To-day the Committee were told that the adoption of universal penny postage would mean a loss of £500,000. The hon. Member for Canterbury calculated that the loss would be £125,000 for the first year. He would sooner take the hon. Member's calculation than that of the Post Office officials, because he had been right throughout and they had been wrong. So far as was known not a single shilling had been lost through the adoption of Imperial penny postage. Before our representatives were sent to Rome the opinion of this House should have been consulted on the question of universal penny postage. The proposal at the Conference in favour of universal penny postage was supported by the representatives of New Zealand and the United States but opposed by this country. He knew that the Postmaster-General had said that our representatives did not vote. They withdrew and he was rather ashamed of them for having done so. He should have liked to have seen this country taking a leading part in bringing about this reform for the welfare of the people, for there was no doubt that the extension of postal facilities tended to good feeling throughout the world. There was something in the newspapers about reducing the postage from 2½d. to 2d., and he understood that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had provided for that loss in the Budget Estimates of this year. What was the Postmaster-General going to do with that money? What he wanted was reforms for the benefit of the people of this country. He did not think there was very much in the complaint about the Canadians having American magazines. He had lived on the American continent for ten years, and he found that the American magazines were better than the English. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen shook their heads, but probably there was not much more in their heads than in some of the English magazines. ["Oh!"] He insisted that a very large number of American magazines were superior to the English magazines. Canadians preferred to read the American magazines rather than some of those produced here. He wanted to call attention to the sweating that was going on in the making of the uniforms for the men in the postal service. For instance, the contractors in the East End of London paid only 6½d. for making a pair of trousers. The middlemen were making a huge profit while the poor wretches who made the trousers were starving. He advocated that the uniforms should be made in Government factories so as to ensure that the real workers were paid a proper wage. Something had been said about introducing politics into the Post Office. When their friends on the Opposition Benches were in office they packed all these billets with Tory officials, and the result was that they could not get any reform.

Sir FREDERICK BANBURY (City of London) asked if it was in order to accuse a Government of packing offices with their friends.

The CHAIRMAN thought that the remark of the hon. Gentleman might cause unnecessary pain, and that it was one which ought not to be made.

*MR. MORTON said that at the suggestion of the Chairman he would withdraw the remark, and there was an end of it; but he was not surprised that his friends opposite were angry about it, their consciences pricked them. He complained that postal and telegraphic facilities in Sutherlandshire were incomplete; some places in that county were twenty miles from a telegraph office, and there were parts of the district where there was only one delivery of letters in the week. That meant that the people could not do their business properly. Moreover, he wanted to know whether the promise of the Prime Minister in regard to colonising our own country was to be carried out. He was afraid that nobody in Downing Street, in spite of that promise, knew anything about colonising. He himself had lived for ten years in the Colonies, and he could assure the Committee that never yet had Downing Street been able to govern a Colony properly. The Colonies only succeeded when they were granted the rights of self-government. That was why Canada was making such leaps and bounds in the way of progress. What the Colonies got was railway communication, postal and telegraphic facilities in order that the settlers might obtain the latest information as regarded prices for their produce. However, what he wanted to press was that the Prime Minister should carry out his promise that we should colonise our own country. There was room in Sutherlandshire for a further population of 50,000 people. One of the difficulties in Sutherlandshire was that, except on the east coast, there was no railway communication, and his right hon. friend the Postmaster-General had not only neglected to, but had refused to give further Post Office facilities in his constituency. This was a serious matter to those farmers, crofters and fishermen who were struggling to get a living. Sutherlandshire had a right to have its reasonable demands in regard to postal facilities acceded to. There was mismanagement with regard to sending the mails by the new motor cars from Lairg to Lochinoh. He understood that that matter was still under the consideration of his right hon. friend, and that he had not yet given a final answer. It was their duty to consider the people who resided in Great Britain and Ireland and to endeavour to make them self-supporting and not to waste millions on wars and rumours of wars.

SIR FREDERICK BANBURY said they had had a most interesting discussion as to the necessity of providing further postal facilities. In regard to that subject he was sure that he never thought that he would be standing there, if the Postmaster-General would allow him, to take the part of that right hon. Gentleman. It must be remembered that although there was a large profit on the Post Office Department, that profit went to defray State expenses, and if the Post Office gave the facilities which hon Gentlemen were asking for they were only taking the money out of one pocket to put it into another, because if the money was spent in the way asked for the result would be that taxation would have to be increased. It was on that ground that, if he would allow him, he wished to say a few words on behalf of the right hon. Gentleman. It had been said that this was not a Party question, and he agreed. It was not a Party question, but a question of business. An hon. Member had alluded to the fact that something like half a million of money appeared in these Estimates for the conveyance of mails upon the roads and had said that that represented about 3 per cent. interest on £20,000,000 of capital. He gathered, however, from the hon. Member's speech that he desired that a large sum of money should be spent upon electric traction without incurring any additional cost. He would point out that a considerable portion of this money was spent in conveying mails in the country, and that it would be impossible on country roads to provide electric traction. No doubt motor traction could be provided, but he had no doubt that that would be much more expensive than the present system. This was a question which had been exercising the minds of the great railway companies in England, who were endeavouring to see if they could not do away with horse and substitute motor traction. The Midland Railway Company had instituted a few motor traction cars, and the right hon. Gentleman was himself making an experiment in regard to a few vehicles of the same class. For himself, he should like to see a system of motor traction instituted, but it must be remembered that as far as the conveyance of goods and parcels was concerned, motor traction was in its infancy, and experience tended to show that while, where they could find a large quantity of heavy goods on a particular road motor traction could be made profitable, where the number of parcels was small motor traction was very much more expensive than horse traction. As far as the Postmaster-General was concerned he thought the right hon. Gentleman had done well to institute in a small degree experiments in motor traction without committing himself to a large expenditure in that direction. His right hon. friend the Member for the Epping Division had alluded to the condition of the horses in the mail carts; and here again he felt compelled to take the part of the Postmaster-General. The condition of the horses in the mail vans was a few years ago extremely bad, and he had the honour of making an inspection of them at the request of the late Postmaster-General. He thought the result was a considerable improvement of the horses and that that improvement had been maintained since. If the right hon. Gentleman the present Postmaster-General asked him to perform a similar office he would be glad to carry it out again. As to wireless telegraphy he could not say whether it would be a commercial success, but up to the present moment it had not been, although the experiments had been interesting. The right hon. Gentleman had not mentioned what the loss would be in regard to his reductions in the charges on postal orders. He should like to know the amount. As to the appointment of a Committee of the House with regard to the wages of Post Office employees he did not propose to go into that question as the Committee was still sitting. He himself had had rather a curious experience in regard to this question in the course of his contest at Peckham. It had, however, nothing to do with his candidature or anything of that sort. He had a discussion with a postman who was exceedingly frank in stating his views, and he did not, after listening to those views, quite agree with the appointment of this Committee. That postman was under the impression that the only way in which he could get his salary increased—he did not blame him, human nature being what it was: he said that the only thing that concerned him was to get a rise in his wages—but he was under the impression that the only way to get that rise was to get his Member to vote for this Committee of Inquiry. For himself he had always refused to give any pledges to do that sort of thing, because it put Members in a very awkward position. If the Committee did not recommend or the House did not agree to a rise in wages there would be a good deal of disappointment, to say nothing of the pressure which would once again be brought to bear upon Members of Parliament by Post Office employees. [LABOUR cries of "Why not?"] He thought there was a very excellent reason against it. If the Committee were going to say that the whole of the Civil service were to use their votes to make Members vote for an increase of their salaries, he thought they were entering upon a very dangerous course. He remembered a brilliant speech by the late Sir William Harcourt, in which that right hon. Gentleman said he hoped both sides would resist any such pressure, and he regretted to hear that any hon. Member thought otherwise. Another point was that if they granted a large increase of salaries, a large number of taxpayers would resist because money would be taken out of their pockets and put into those of others, when they were not in a much better position, if any, than the recipients of the increased wages. The hon. Member for Canterbury was very wise in calling attention to the losses on the telegraph service, and he hoped it would be a warning to the right hon. Gentleman not to accede to the demand of the hon. Member for Sutherlandshire to give him further telegraphic facilities in the county he represented. He could not know what the cost would be until he had tried the changes. There was not the slightest doubt that the reduction of telegraphic charges had caused loss, although when the reduction was made it was expected to be profitable. The reduction having been made, however, it was difficult to go back to the old charge, and he thought the right hon. Gentleman would find that to be the case if he made the reductions now suggested. He had only one other point to which he wished to allude, and that was with regard to the medical officers. He found on page 68 of the Estimates that certain salaries were given to medical officers, and on page 82 that a payment was made to them of 8s. 6d. per head. Those payments altogether amounted to £720. What he wished to know was whether the payment of 8s. 6d. per head was in addition to the salary.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: No, the two things are quite separate.

SIR FREDERICK BANBURY said he was glad to hear it. He would conclude by hoping that the right hon. Gentleman would be a little stiff with regard to the concessions that had been asked for.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON assured the hon. Member for Sutherlandshire and the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland that he was quite as much alive as they were to the importance of increased postal and telegraphic facilities in the distant parts to which they had alluded. It was not a question of profit. On the contrary, there was always a loss on the postal facilities to these distant parts, and the question that must arise in regard to all those special cases was whether the increased burden was justified. Upon the general question, he hoped the postal reforms to which he had referred in his opening statement would be of great profit to the country. He assured the hon. Member for Sutherland that he was carefully considering the proposals he had brought before him. With regard to the question of motors, the postal authorities already made some use of motors, and they were at the present time in negotiation for a more extended use, and intended to use them to the utmost extent on the main posts. And, of course, any advantage that accrued to the main posts from their use must accrue to the branch posts. He thought the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland had rather exaggerated the conditions which obtained in the postal service to those districts, because there were already three deliveries a week in the winter, and five in the summer.

MR. CATHCART WASON: Not in the ordinary sense of a delivery every other day.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON said he understood that the hon. Member proposed to bring a deputation to him and he would be glad to go into the details then. The right hon. Member for the Wellington Division of Somerset mentioned the case of Exbourne. If the right hon. Member would draw his special attention to the conditions prevailing in that particular district he would do his best to meet his view, and he hoped under the new arrangements he would be able to do so. If the hon. Member for South Tyrone could suggest, as he had intimated, immense improvements in the postal service at no cost at all he should be delighted to meet him in any suggestions he had to make.

The hon. Member for Sleaford had referred to the question of vaccination. All he could say in reply was that, rightly or wrongly, the general system of the British Civil service was that the men engaged in it should be vaccinated. If that was right in regard to other Departments it was still more necessary and right in regard to the postal service. He assumed that vaccination was an advantage. That was the basis of the system of compulsory vaccination for the Civil service. If that was so, it must be quite clear that the men in the Postal service were the ones that ought of all others to be vaccinated, as they ran greater risk not only of contracting smallpox themselves but of carrying the contagion among the public. They had to go to poor districts and had to handle all sorts of packages, and in the sorting office more men were employed in one room than in any other Department of the Civil service. Last year in the whole of the postal service, comprising 150,000 men, there was no case of death or retirement caused either by smallpox or vaccination. The noble Lord the Member for Oxford had raised the question of reduced cost for the supply of literature to the blind. It had not yet been possible for him to decide definitely the final basis upon which the concession should be founded, but its general line would be a material reduction in the cost of parcels post under restrictions that would confine it to bona-fide cases. The hon. Member for Bethnal Green had raised a question in respect to contractors' carmen. He sympathised with the views expressed with regard to the excessive hours of work and the inadequate wage paid. But the difficulty in regard to contractors' employees was that it would involve an entire change in the system to give direct employment and necessitate large annual expenditure in building and so on, and that was one of the matters he had not yet been able to give proper attention to. As regarded the question of wages under existing contracts, he had done his best, when his attention had been drawn to any particular case, to insist as far as he could upon what seemed to be a fair wage and fair conditions. He would be glad to look into any specific case his hon. friend brought to him. The great difficulty was that there was no recognised rate of wages. He was giving considerable attention to the matter. The deputation which he was going to receive next week might be able to throw some light on the matter. Unfortunately, he was very much tied, because the contracts ranged over a very considerable period. That, of course, did not affect the fair wages clause. In any new contract he should certainly see that the proper conditions prevailed. In a case in which he did not think the employer was in a position to carry out the conditions of labour he had given notice to terminate the contract. He was endeavouring to arrive at some conclusion with the Canadian Government as to postage of Canadian newspapers. He recognised the great services rendered by the hon. Member for Canterbury to the cause of postal reform; but he would remind him that it was easier to devise reforms than to get from the Treasury the money necessary to carry them out. He believed the hon. Member for Sutherland thought that the whole of the surplus ought to be applied to Post Office reform, or, at all events, a large portion of it.

MR. MORTON: I did not say that, but I will say it now if you like.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON said that of course he did not agree with his hon. friend on that point. He thought the revenue from the Post Office must be used as some relief to the taxpayer. The question of the amount of money that ought to be given to the Postmaster-General was a source of perpetual difference and argument between the two offices concerned. As to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Canterbury that postcards should be sold for their face value, his attention was directed to that matter when he considered how best to dispose of the sum which the Treasury gave him on this occasion. To have carried out the reform suggested would have cost between £30,000 and £40,000 a year, and he came to the conclusion that the reform he had introduced would be more useful. The hon. Gentleman's wish, however, was one which he would like to see carried out, and when he got a little more money out of the Treasury perhaps he might be able to bring it about. In regard to the loss of articles in the post, where it was due to the fault of the Post Office he was willing to give proper compensation, but the Postmaster-General could not be liable for any amount of damages where there was a difference of opinion in regard to the value of a particular article. An important point which had been made and for which something might be said was that under proper conditions a letter which had been posted ought to be able to be recalled. With regard to universal penny postage, it would involve an initial cost of £500,000 a year; and as there would be no profit on a foreign letter carried for 1d., it was impossible that any increase in correspondence should make up for the initial loss. The hon. Gentleman had said that the loss would be £125,000 a year, but he did not understand where the hon. Gentleman got his figures from. Last October the hon. Member, in a letter to the Times, stated that the cost of universal penny postage would be £375,000 a year. He could not see how the two figures could be made to correspond.

*Mr. HENNIKER HEATON said the increase of letters accounted for it.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON said the point they were discussing was the initial cost. However, he would not trouble the Committee further, only maintaining that the figure he gave was the correct one.

Mr. MORTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman reply upon the clothing question.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON reminded the hon. member that in his opening remarks he said that up to now the Postmaster-General had possessed no means of looking into the conditions of labour which prevailed under the contracts. But he had been able to appoint an inspector for this purpose, and he hoped that in future the Department would be in a better condition to look into and to control the conditions of labour under contracts.

Colonel KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) urged the claims of poor old soldiers for employment in the Post Office service, and called attention to the possible overburdening of rural postmen owing to the number of parcels containing agricultural and other produce that had to be carried. Had anything been done in the direction of getting into communication with the officers in command of depots and others for the purpose of giving employment to old soldiers, and had any steps been taken to increase the number of soldiers employed in this way? He did not think there could be any more legitimate demand made than that these positions should be made available to old soldiers and sailors. [Why?"] It was his opinion that those who had served their country in the Army and Navy had a very strong claim for these positions.

Mr. J. WARD: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman if they are competent for the business they undertake.

Colonel KENYON-SLANEY: Allowing that they were competent, he thought they had a fair claim to those positions. Rural postmen did not require to be highly educated men, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give full consideration to this matter, and get in touch in the rural districts with those who were able to tell him who were the right men to employ. He was glad to hear that the right hon. Gentleman had given increased facilities for the carrying of agricultural produce. He did not in the least wish to minimise the value of that boon, but he was afraid that the result would be that the number of parcels piled upon the back and shoulders of the rural postmen, who often had to go across fields and cross roads, would be enormously increased. Those who saw the rural postmen labouring under all these difficulties must feel with him that there ought to be some limit. He hoped some means would be found by which these men would be relieved, as it was not fair that in consequence of this change there should be put upon these men a burden which they could not reasonably be expected to carry. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give his attention to this matter.

Mr. AINSWORTH (Argyllshire) said that the proposed increase in the number of deliveries of letters to private houses in the Highlands, where the houses were extremely scattered, might involve a very large expenditure. He thought it would be of much greater benefit to the district to give a better mail service than an increase in the deliveries of letters. He desired to thank the Postmaster-General for the enormous boon he had conferred upon the West Coast by enabling them to have the London mail earlier.

Mr. CHARLES DEVLIN (Galway) said that if there was any Government Department in which good service should be extended to the people it was the Post Office. He was glad to hear from the Postmaster-General that he had been successful in getting back from the Chancellor of the Exchequer a reasonable proportion of the profits of the Post Office, and he hoped a fair share of that money would reach Ireland. He regretted that he could not agree with some of the conclusions of the hon. Member for Sutherland, who found fault generally with the Post Office service, which he said contrasted very unfavourably with the service he had seen in the Colonies. He could not agree with that contention. The telegraph service in this country was at the disposal of the Government and the telephone system was also largely controlled by them, whereas in Canada both telegraphs and telephones belonged to companies which were in no way controlled by the Government, nor were they established on so good a basis as in this country. In Canada their letters were not brought to the doors, and in many respects comparisons were odious. With regard to the charge of filling the Department with the friends of politicians, that kind of thing existed to a certain extent everywhere. Unfortunately, it existed in Ireland, and many of those in charge of the administration of post offices in Ireland neither belonged to Ireland nor understood the postal wants of the country. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would make some statement in regard to the representations which had been made to him in relation to Canada. He did not agree with the statement that the magazines and publications of this country were inferior to those of the United States; he thought they were of just as high an order as those published in America. The fact was that a demand had been made throughout Canada and other portions of the Empire for better facilities to obtain those publications, in order that they might be placed within the reach of Canadians. That request had not only come from the Press of Canada, and the large body of readers in that Colony, but it had formed the subject of a very important debate in the Canadian Senate, during which it was supported by prominent members of the Canadian Government and the Opposition. A Resolution in this direction was passed by the Canadian Government and forwarded to the Postmaster-General of the late Government. He knew that there was a strong feeling in Canada upon the subject. He took exception to the statement of the Postmaster-General that Irish Members ought to be grateful for all he had done for Ireland by the extension of the telephone. Year in and year out he had asked the Post Office to extend the telephone system from Dublin to Galway, and nothing had been done; but now that the Postmaster-General was rich enough to give so many millions to the Chancellor of the Exchequer he hoped a telephonic trunk line between the extreme east and west of Ireland would be established. Representations had been made to the Postmaster-General by leading bodies in Dublin and Galway in favour of the establishment of the telephone system between the two cities. He wished to remind the right hon. Gentleman of a subject which was brought before him some months ago in the form of a Question, namely, the manufacture of postmen's clothes. The contracts for clothing were not at that time given so freely and extensively in Ireland as they might have been. While he did not object to employment being given in this country, he did object to the means of livelihood being taken away from a considerable section of the Irish population. The figures which had been placed before the House showed that the people were going away from Ireland in considerable numbers because they could not find employment. By placing more contracts in Ireland for clothing, the Postmaster-General could not only do good work for the people there, but obtain for the Department the very articles which were required. The right hon. Gentleman told him that a little contract had been given, but he himself thought more might have been done in this direction. Referring to the despatch of letters to New York by the mail leaving at the middle of the week, he said that on Wednesday he posted a letter for America, believing that it was in time for the mail. In order to be sure he asked the postmaster whether it was in time, and he discovered that it was not. One could never be sure as to the departure of mails for the United States and Canada on Wednesday, there being no fixed and regular hour of closing. He understood that the inconvenience of which he complained arose from the White Star line being unable sometimes to provide fast steamers, and that the Post Office was obliged on these occasions to send the mails by German steamers from Southampton. He asked the right hon. Gentleman to look into this matter with the view of getting the White Star line to make their fast steamers available for the carrying of the mails.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON, who was indistinctly heard, was understood to say that certain figures which he quoted were not inconsistent with others which an hon. Member had given.

MR. ROWLANDS (Kent, Dartford) thanked the Postmaster-General for extending the telegraphic facilities in the country. He stated that he was the first Member of Parliament to call attention to the grievances of the mail-cart drivers, and he had to discuss it with former Postmaster-Generals. He found that nothing much had been done. He pressed upon the Postmaster-General the importance of scheduling the hours to be worked by the mail-cart drivers in future contracts. He knew that the right hon. Gentleman would find great difficulty in getting anything like accurate information as to the hours now worked by the men.

MR. PICKERSGILL thanked the Postmaster-General for his reply, and asked leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD (Liverpool, West Derby) expressed regret that the Postmaster-General should have allowed himself to say of the secretary of Lloyd's, Sir H. Hozier, that he issued a circular which was a travesty of the truth. Sir H. Hozier was a gentleman with a reputation second to none in the city of London, and it was most unfortunate that the right hon. Gentleman should have used such strong language regarding him. In respect to the question of wireless telegraphy, he understood that the idea of the Government in what they proposed to do was to prevent foreigners, in case of war, being able to take advantage of this country. In order to do that they had made a contract with the Marconi Company. He found that the directors of that company who were going to protect us against foreign invasion were M. de Volder (President), M. Balser, M. de Coe Thys, M. M. Travailleur, G. Marconi, A. Ochs, I. Lowr, M. Renouard, M. Ch. Roux, M. E. de St. Paul de Sincary, Eruesto M Pinto, and M. Nagelruackers.

MR. J. WARD: Is the hon. Member satisfied that that is not a Transvaal mining company?

MR. W. RUTHERFORD: That is a very unseemly interruption.

And, it being a quarter-past Eight of the clock, and there being Private Business set down, by direction of the Chairman of Ways and Means, under Standing Order No. 8, further proceeding was postponed without Question put.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (MONEY) BILL [BY ORDER].

Order for consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill, as amended, be now considered."

MR. RAWLINSON (Cambridge University) said that in moving that this Bill should be considered upon that day three months, he had no desire to interfere with nor had he any hostility to the municipal enterprise of the London County Council. But he thought it was only right that, in the public interest, an explanation should be given to the House of Commons of the expenditure of the London County Council whenever they came to the House, as in this instance, for Parliamentary sanction for loans on an exceedingly large scale. In the case of any ordinary borough or city, where sanction for loans had to be obtained, it was necessary to have a local inquiry presided over by a representative of the Local Government Board. But, in the case of the London County Council, the House of Commons was put in the position of the inspector of the Local Government Board. He thought it would be admitted that there was some grounds for inquiry into, or at any rate, explanation of, the growing increase in the indebtedness of the London County Council. When the London County Council succeeded the Metropolitan Board of Works in 1889 their indebtedness was about £17,000,000. In dealing with the London County Council finance, there were two heads which had to be considered—money borrowed for their own purposes, and money borrowed for the purpose of re-lending it to subsidiary authorities. He wanted to deal now only with the money which the London County Council had borrowed for their own purposes. As he had said, when the London County Council succeeded the Metropolitan Board of Works their indebtedness was £17,000,000. Ten years afterwards it had increased to £21,000,000; but by 1905 it had attained to the vast amount of £44,000,000. He was not for a moment posing as a person who would take up a strong position on one side or the other. What he wanted was that some explanation should be given to the House of this extraordinary increase. He found that the original estimate for the building of Vauxhall Bridge was £484,000, and that the revised estimate was £535,000, or a difference of £50,000. He would like to know whether that revised estimate meant the total cost of the bridge, or if there was an additional sum yet to be paid? Again, the original estimate of the cost of the Strand improvements was £4,800,000, while the actual cost was £5,186,000. What was the explanation of these large miscalculations? Was it the fact, that after certain people had received compensation, it was found that their buildings would not be required owing to changes in the original plan? He would like to know why the large island area facing the Strand was not put into the market, and was only used for temporary purposes by the Salvation Army. There seemed to be a lack of proper organisation and foresight in regard to these Strand improvements. There were other two items which demanded particular notice. The first was the river steamboat service. The original estimate of the cost was £280,000, the revised estimate was £304,000, while the loss on the service last year was £51,000. He wanted to know whether it was intended to carry on that steamboat service in the winter as well as in the summer. To a very indirect extent he was interested in this matter, because he once invested £100 in a steamboat company which the London County Council had run off the river. He had not sustained a very substantial loss, because he had never expected a dividend, but he should very much like, from a business point of view, to know whether the London County Council were going to run a winter service at a prospective loss of £50,000. Then there was the question of the tramways. A very large loan was being asked for for the extension of the tramways, and he wished the hon. Gentleman who represented the London County Council would give the House some explanation of this large additional expenditure. Was it the fact that the London County Council, in carrying a large amount to the reserve fund of the tramway enterprise, were acting in direct opposition to the recommendations of their Finance Committee? In view of the steamboat enterprise not turning out so well as the County Council anticipated, was that body justified in being so optimistic about the taking over of the northern system of tramways and asking sanction for exceedingly large loans in connection with it? He attached great weight to this question of increased municipal expenditure at the present time. The harsh incidence of taxation caused not only suffering among people with fixed incomes and small professional men, but the removal of industries from London to other places where the rates were less. They were now asked to sanction a very large sum of money for the building of a great county hall on the other side of Westminster Bridge—a very expensive quarter. Surely that was a luxury which might very well be deferred for a few years. He moved that the Bill be considered that day three months.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day three months.'"—(Mr. Rawlinson.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*MR. WOOD (Glasgow, St. Rollox) said he gathered from the hon. Member for Cambridge University that he did not intend to press this Amendment to a division. If he did it would be a most unusual course in regard to a Money Bill of the London County Council, having regard to the peculiar position in which London County Council finance stood under the Standing Orders of Parliament. If the Bill were lost there would be chaos in the municipal administration of London, but he understood the hon. Member would not press his Motion, but was rather desirous of being reassured. There was nothing from which the County Council suffered more than financial criticism without knowledge. There was a general vague impression that the Council was responsible for every rise in the rates. The rates of the County Council ten years ago were 1s. 3d. in the £; they were in the current year 1s. 5d. in the £. That increase of 2d. was not enormous, considering that the County Council had inherited from the Metropolitan Board of Works great arrears of work which had to be carried out in the interests of the health and welfare of Londoners.

MR. RAWLINSON said he was not referring to the 1s. 3d. and the 1s. 5d.; the more important aspect of the matter was that the County Council had raised the rateable value of London, and he was referring to the actual amount of rates.

*MR. WOOD said that that increase in the rateable value argued that great improvements had taken place, and that much new property had been created. But, of course, the creation of new property carried with it increased obligations, and the Council had had to extend their main drainage system and fire brigade. A much more serious thing for the citizens than the increase in rates was the increase in rents. In accounting for the rise of rates he had first of all to point out that they suffered from a serious falling off in the surplus from the Exchequer contributions available for reducing rates. About fourteen or fifteen years ago the London County Council was able to apply from the Exchequer grants £290,000 in relief of rates. Since then the gross amount had increased very slightly, but the duties placed on the Council of paying money out of these grants for statutory purposes had so increased that they were now only able to apply £30,000. That accounted for ¾d. out of the 2d. It was not increase of expenditure but diminution of receipts. These grants were expected to be a very important and growing relief to local rates when first sanctioned by Parliament, but the Royal Commission on Local Taxation which reported some time ago admitted in the frankest manner that London had been very unfairly treated in this matter. He had accounted for ¾d. The next item to which he would like to allude was the large Strand improvement that had been undertaken by the London County Council at the desire of the people of London and at the urgent request of the Party to which the hon. Member opposite belonged. He remembered Lord Rosebery once saying that the policy of the Party opposite was to lower the rates and to widen the Strand. Those were two things that could not be accomplished by one operation. The cost of the Strand and the Westminster improvements, which was a temporary charge, had added to the debt of London £6,250,000, and the service of the debt this year cost London £175,000, or about 1d. rate. Then there was the case of the steam-boats, which had cost a farthing rate. Main drainage had also cost a good deal, and the increase of the fire brigade, largely caused by the disastrous fires in the City of London, cost another halfpenny. So that he had accounted for more than the 2d., which had been the rise in the rates on the last ten years. The hon. Member for Cambridge University said that in 1899 their debt was only £21,000,000, and that it was now £44,000,000, but he had forgotten to mention to the House that Parliament had placed on the Council the responsibility for the education of London, and with that had placed on their shoulders the old School Board debt of £11,500,000. That was a substantial figure which he thought ought in common justice to be mentioned, but which in political controversy was frequently ignored. With regard to Vauxhall Bridge, he was informed that the figure mentioned in the Bill would not be exceeded. He was not surprised that some explanation had been asked for with regard to the Strand improvement, but the answer was a very simple one. There had been no increase in the expenditure, and the amount now asked for was not to pay greater compensation. It was a bookkeeping item. The Clare market scheme and the Strand improvement were dealt with nearly at the same time. The County Council had intended to re-house a number of the people who were displaced by the improvement on the Clare Market area. But it was eventually found desirable to re-house them elsewhere, and the cost of the land no longer required for this purpose had been added to the cost of the improvement. It was a mere book-keeping entry which required them to deal with it in this way, and the change had resulted in a saving of money. The property for the Strand improvement had been acquired within the estimate of the County Council's valuer, which was made at the beginning of the undertaking. With regard to the steamboats, he trusted they would not be run during the winter months. They had had some experience of running a few during last winter, and it was obvious that the traffic was more or less a summer traffic. There was, however, one important fact to be noticed with regard to the steamboat service. In the first place, all the witnesses before the Committee were perfectly clear in saying they did not expect the business to be carried on without loss during the first few years. Several of them thought it would ultimately be carried on at a profit, and time alone could prove whether their anticipations would be realised. Another curious thing was that they had never brought forward a project that was so strongly supported by the borough councils of London. They came forward one after the other and said they wished the project carried out; that they were prepared to pay their share of the loss; that they hoped it would not be much, but that they thought the service would be well worth a rate of a farthing or a halfpenny. So far the loss had been about a farthing. The traffic had improved. They had carried 240,000 passengers in Whit week, and had been carrying between 45,000 and 90,000 passengers a week during the last two months. Not only had the County Council the support of the borough councils, but they had the support of the entire Press without regard to politics. They were urged to take this step by the entire Press of London. He would give only one example. The St. James's Gazette, not an advocate of municipal trading, had thus exhorted them—

> "That great neglected highway lies within a stone's throw of Spring Gardens. Let the London County Council neglect it no longer. At present they are neglecting not only the river but their duty."

Mr. Hayes Fisher, the late Member for Fulham, gave evidence in favour of the scheme, as well as the present Member for Hammersmith. It was not a Party undertaking. It was undertaken with the full admission of the County Council that they did not expect any immediate financial profit. With regard to the new County Hall, he might say that at the present moment the County Council was housed in nearly thirty different buildings, and he put it to any practical business man whether that was not a spendthrift and unsatisfactory way of conducting public business. They could have no control over it, and it led to an enormous waste of time. They were building on the other side of the Thames not a palace but a workshop, and they thought it right that they should provide a workshop which was efficient and in which work could be done without waste of time and without extravagance. The hon. Member had said the tramways were a debatable point. He could not understand how anybody could look at the London tramways without seeing that London had in them an extremely valuable asset, and that the investment from the point of view of the ratepayers was an extremely profitable one. The small actual balance was no adequate test during a period of reconstruction, when miles of horse-tramways were being relaid for electric traction and traffic was dislocated. But they might take another test. They found as they changed from horse to electric traction the number of their passengers increased, and that the earning powers of the trams increased in a large measure. They had reckoned that if they got 1s. a car per mile it would be a profitable return, because the expense of hiring electric power from a company was 8d., which left 4d. for the payment of interest and sinking fund. They further estimated that when the station at Greenwich was complete the cost of electric power would be about 7d., and that station was now working. As a matter of fact, the expense of the electricity from a company had been a little less than 8d., and the receipts had been a little above 1s., and their margin for the interest and the sinking fund had averaged 4½d. instead of 4d. During the last two years the actual results had been better than they estimated by about £30,000 a year. He protested against the practice of looking at municipal finance without having regard to sinking fund. The sinking fund contained the money laid by for the redemption of debt. In the case of the tramways the greater part of the debt would be redeemed in twenty-five years, and supposing they made no profits but merely sufficient to keep up the interest out of revenue, while laying by the necessary amount for renewals, they had a sinking fund which would create a very valuable property for London in the future. They had already laid by £450,000. But they were doing better than that. He would like to call attention to a comparison made between the returns of municipal undertakings and those of private companies. That was of course taking the two accounts on the same basis. In the case of the London County Council southern tramways for the year ending March 31st, 1905, the capital expenditure was £2,600,000, and the profit on working was £203,000, the percentage of profit to capital expenditure being over 7½ per cent. The London United Tramways Company for the year ending December, 1904, with a capital expenditure of £2,900,000, made a profit of £120,000, or a percentage of 4·1 per cent. The amount placed to reserve and depreciation accounts was £66,600 in the case of the Council trams, against £5,000 by the London United Tramways. At that time the Council were not generating their own electricity. To show the profitableness of electric traction as compared with horse traction he might inform the House that from Greenwich to the bridges in the last complete year of horse traction the receipts were £98,490; the 1905 receipts, under electric traction, were £169,000. The passengers carried were 23,000,000 in the former period, and in the latter 37,000,000. They looked to the number of persons carried as much as to the receipts. They embarked on these enterprises not solely to make money for the ratepayers, but to provide services for them which would not be provided by private enterprise. In the case of private ventures, routes which were immediately profitable must be chosen; but the London County Council could have regard to the development of traffic as affecting the housing of the people and the business interests of the town. They had tried to serve not one class, but all classes of the community. The people of London must become accustomed to large figures, for London had the population of a province and the wealth of a kingdom. They were bound to see that the resources of their great city were wisely and economically, but not stingily, administered.

SIR F. BANBURY said he had previously understood that the profits of municipal trading were to go in the relief of rates. He now understood from the hon. Gentleman it was not so, but that it was a kind of philanthropic enterprise.

*MR. WOOD said the hon. Gentleman was not accurately representing what he said. He mentioned distinctly that they were very willing to make profits, but that they regarded municipal enterprise as having further reaching and more important effects.

SIR F. BANBURY said he now gathered that profit was a consideration, but only a secondary one. He agreed that if the Amendment were carried the result would be chaos in London county finance, and for that reason he trusted it would not be pressed to a division. He would have liked to move that some of the clauses should be referred back to the Committee, for they had a far-reaching financial effect. They were not clauses connected in any way with the administration of the expenditure of the London County Council. He was raising the question merely in the interests of sound finance. He objected to Clause 4 because it provided not for one year's expenditure, but for expenditure for eighteen months. He contended that the estimates of the London County Council submitted to the House should be framed for one year, and not for eighteen months, in order that the House might retain its control. There was no magic in eighteen months, and if the principle were admitted it might easily be said that authority should be obtained for two or three years. A very serious point was raised in regard to Clause 15 because it allowed the provision for the redemption of the Sinking Fund to be abolished. [Cries of "No."] Then what did it mean? Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would explain.

*MR. WOOD: It certainly does not mean that.

SIR F. BANBURY said it meant the use of the money which had been put by for the Sinking Fund. Was not that correct? The hon. Gentleman did not answer. That being correct, then, it meant the use of money put by for the Sinking Fund, and that was the worst possible thing that could be done in finance; the Sinking Fund should be kept as a sacred trust for a certain purpose. It was not new, it had been done by other municipalities. The next point was one in connection with Clause 17, where practically dividend was allowed to be paid out of capital. That was a mistake when applied to companies, and led to reckless finance, but to give such power to a municipality like the London County Council was sheer madness. Why should they use to pay interest money which they had borrowed? Their duty was to pay interest out of the revenue they raised. He had put three extremely important points, which he was quite certain could not be answered.

*MR. DICKINSON said he rose to reply to the three points put by the last speaker. But first he wished to express satisfaction that the subject of London finance should form the basis of a discussion in this House. He believed that nothing but good could come of it. At a time when municipal expenditure was becoming more and more important it was as well that they should understand the methods that had been adopted by a body which was unique in the excellence of its financial arrangements, under the guidance of some of the most eminent servants of the State. The points raised by the hon. Member had again and again been considered, not only by the council, but by this House, guided by the views of the Treasury. On all questions of loans the Treasury had something to say. The answer to the question why the Council asked power to borrow for eighteen months was apparent on the face of the schedule. That schedule gave the amounts to be authorised and stated that the estimates were required for the twelve months ending March 31st, 1907, and that an additional sum was required to carry on to September 30th. Unless the latter authority were given all the powers of the Council of capital expenditure would expire in March next before Parliament would have had the opportunity of renewing them by passing the Annual Money Act in June or July, and the Council's work would thus come to a temporary standstill. The next point raised had relation to a matter which also had Treasury sanction. The debt was not repayable until sixty years after borrowing, and the earliest payment would be in 1929. In order to prevent the piling up of a great fund of money for repaying the stockholders, it was thought well that use should be made of the accumulating fund to make short loans to various London public bodies, conditions being strictly laid down, in the clause, for repayment of the whole before the money became due to stockholders. This course might be open to the theoretical objection that the money for the stockholders was not in the Council's coffers at the particular moment, but it was there so far as London as a whole was concerned, and the borough councils and the boards of guardians were solvent. Therefore the stockholders were perfectly secure, as the money would be back again in the Council's hands before it was required for redemption. The third point raised by the hon. Member was that permission was given in certain conditions to pay interest out of capital. He was not sure this was the case in the Bill they were discussing, although he knew that the Council were anxious to be allowed to do what many companies had done in the initial stages of a great undertaking. This plan was eminently suitable for municipal operations. One of the cases in which the council realised the necessity for such a plan was the Strand-Holborn improvement. An enormous amount of money had to be borrowed for the purchase of land which in a very short time was going to be let off on long leases, and it appeared to be perfectly fair that the ratepayers in the first year or two should not be called upon to pay very large interest while waiting for the time when the property would become remunerative. Those were all the points raised by the hon. Baronet, and he was grateful to him and the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge for having brought these points forward and having afforded him an opportunity of placing these facts before the House.

*MR. BRIDGEMAN (Shropshire, Oswestry) thought they were entitled to ask for a little more information. It had been said that this Bill dealt with a question of national importance and that it dealt with the finances of a kingdom. He thought an hour's discussion of a question of such magnitude was a very short time indeed. He did not find fault with the aims and aspirations of hon. Members who represented the London County Council, but the question was: How far would the experiments that had been tried do harm, although they were intended to do good? He thought an increase of 2d. in the county council rate was considerable, having regard to the increased rateable value, and they had not received a satisfactory reply in regard to the increase of the debt. They had been told that the London County Council had the advantage of retired officials from the Treasury to guide them in questions of finance. That was perfectly true, but was it true that the council had listened to the advice which some of those gentlemen had given? He knew that the Council had received one or two warnings from the present Chairman of the Finance Committee. He thought the increase in the rates was very severe, and would have a considerable tendency in the direction of driving people out of London. [AN HON. MEMBER: Whose rates?] He was referring to the London County Council rates. He did not complain that the rates were going up on account of education, but an increase in the London County Council rate of 2d. was a heavy increase when they took into account the enormous increase in the rateable value. The accusation that the Council had made rash estimates of their expenditure had been denied, but why was it that they had asked in this Bill for more than half a million of money to make good deficiencies in estimates? He should have thought that it would have been possible to bring the estimates nearer the mark than that. With regard to the tramways, he wished to know what proportion of the expenses of street widenings was charged to the tramway account. That was a point which he thought they required some enlightenment upon. In the earlier part of the Bill it was proposed to empower the Council to construct and equip new tramways, institute certain street improvements, purchase land, and spend money for these and other purposes. Money was spent on the widening of streets where tramways were made, and he wanted to know how that money was accounted for in the tramways account. He fancied that the streets widening account of the London County Council last year amounted to something like £4,000,000, but that did not affect his argument, whatever the figure might be. He understood that the County Council professed to charge one-third of the cost of street widening to the tramways account. He asked how much of the salaries of the staff were charged to the tramways account. He was glad to hear that the County Council did not propose to continue the service of steam boats next winter. He should like to get some further information in regard to the finance of the new offices. The hon. Member for the St. Rollox division had said that the County Council were housed at present in thirty different buildings. Were they to understand that accommodation would be provided in the new premises for the whole of the staff now housed in these thirty buildings? If so, his objection to the new building would be entirely removed.

*Mr. BAKER (Finsbury, E.) said it might interest the House to know that hitherto the amount paid on the basis of one-third of the cost of street widening on account of tramways had been in respect of streets where not a single tramway car had yet been run. The amount involved on capital account was already about £100,000, and the amount paid out in advance for interest and sinking fund charges was between £10,000 and £12,000. Last year, £6,000 was charged to the tramways account as interest and sinking fund charges on capital for street widening in respect of streets where probably no car would run for the next six months. He asked the House to take note of the fact that while the tramways account was charged with the cost of laying down and maintaining the pavement between the tracks and eighteen inches on each side, the electric tramways did not involve the use of the pavement in the slightest degree. There were no horses' hoofs to wear out the paving. On the other hand they provided cars which carried seventy passengers, that being double the number carried by a motor omnibus. In doing so they removed from the actual street traffic 50 per cent. of the vehicles that would otherwise be required to carry the same number of passengers. As to the question of the contribution of the County Council to the reduction of the rates, some interesting tables had been prepared by the Council's comptroller. Hitherto the amount contributed by the profits of the County Council was no less than £293,000, and that was after paying interest and providing a sinking fund, under which the whole cost of the buildings and lines would be paid in twenty-five years, and also after providing a reserve fund of over £100,000. £607,000 had also been paid out of profits in reduction of debt. The House might be perfectly assured that the County Council finance was on the soundest basis.

Mr. VICTOR CAVENDISH (Derbyshire, W.) said the points raised by his hon. friends had been most admirably met by the hon. Members who had spoken for the London County Council. He wished to have further information in regard to the item of £32,000 referred to in Section 34 of the schedule. He expressed surprise that no representative of the Treasury was present. He understood that the President of the Local Government Board was present not so much as a representative of the Government but as a proud parent looking with admiration on the healthy appetite of his offspring. In view of the fact that many of these proposals must come before the Treasury for approval it was unfortunate that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not present. They might have been favoured with a discourse such as they were able to have the pleasure of reading in the papers that morning from the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the evils of municipal borrowing, and it would have been interesting to the House if instead of making that speech elsewhere he had reserved it for the present important debate. He should have liked to know the view of the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon this Bill. This was an important matter from the point of view of the London ratepayers, and also from the point of view of national finance, for the London County Council would have to go into the market from time to time to borrow. He hoped his hon. friend would not press the Amendment.

Mr. STRAUS (Tower Hamlets, Mile End) said he rose to correct a misapprehension that seemed to exist owing to a remark made by the hon. Member for the City. There was nothing in this Bill to enable the London County Council to pay interest out of capital, although if the Council were a public company, there was no doubt that they would have asked for this power. Railway companies were invariably allowed to pay interest out of capital during construction. Section 17 of the Bill which was the section referred to by the hon. Member for St. Pancras, and which was exectly the same as in the Council's former money Bills, empowered the Council when it issued a loan to pay out of the proceeds thereof interest on the new stock for the period prior to the receipts of the cash instalments of the loan. That extra interest was, of course, taken into consideration by those applying for the stock, and a higher price was realised. There was no doubt that the finance of the London County Council was on a perfectly sound basis; it was stronger and more secure than that of any public company and would bear the most careful and minute examination.

MR. RAWLINSON said he was absolutely satisfied with the explanation which had been given and he asked leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to. Bill, as Amended, considered.

Ordered, That Standing Orders 223 and 243 be suspended, and that the Bill be now read the third time.—(The Chairman of Ways and Means.)

Bill accordingly read the third time, and passed.

REVENUE DEPARTMENTS.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum not exceeding £10,426,741, be granted to His Majesty to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on March 31st, 1907, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Post Office, including Telegraphs."

MR. J. WARD said that it had been urged that day that great consideration should be shown to discharged soldiers by the Postmaster-General in taking them into the employment of the Department. But he urged that the Postmaster-General before giving special facilities for taking discharged soldiers into the postal service should consider the claim of the thousands of boys who were already in the service as telegraphic messengers. These boys often remained in the Post Office until they were fourteen or fifteen years of age, when it was too late for them to equip themselves for other employment, and were then turned adrift because vacancies could not be found for them. So far as ordinary labourers were concerned, they were treated in accordance with Trade Union conditions, with the exception of the timbermen, who were paid at the rate of 8d. per hour for ten hours a day, whereas the Postmaster-General only paid them 7d. per hour. He wished to call attention to the unsatisfactory accommodation of the post office at Stoke. It was an old railway shed fitted up forty years ago for the purpose of a post office, and he believed if the right hon. the Postmaster-General only visited the place he would acknowledge that it was the worst equipped post office in the whole country. With regard to labour matters generally, he wished to thank the Postmaster-General for the consideration which he had given to all demands made by working men for fair treatment in his Department. Never before did he remember such careful attention being paid to the grievances of workmen employed by a Government Department; and he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would have many years to carry on his enlightened supervision of that Department.

MR. SILCOCK (Somersetshire, Wells) said he wished to draw attention to the distribution of lottery circulars through the Post Office. In a case recently brought to his notice, the circulars were posted in London, and he insisted that steps should be taken to prevent the circulation of those incitements to gambling.

*MR. BRIDGEMAN said that he had had complaints from business men in a small way in country towns as to the fee of £2 charged in connection with the delivery of telegrams at their private residences after business hours. The clerks in the Post Office had to be there at any rate, and it was only a question of the messengers having to go perhaps a few hundred yards further, and it was hard that these small dealers should have to pay £2 a year for this small advantage. It would be simpler to make a small surcharge on each telegram. The hon. Member also drew attention to the burdens which rural postmen had to carry. There was at the present moment, he knew, a limit of weight, and if the burden of the postman exceeded that limit the postmaster was expected to engage an extra postman to carry whatever was in excess of the limit. He doubted very much, however, whether that order was always carried out, as he had often seen postmen overburdened. He hoped that in future steps would be taken to see that the limit of weight was never exceeded. He hoped, moreover, that the carrying out of the new rules in regard to the conveyance of agricultural produce would not entail more severe labour upon the rural postman than was absolutely necessary. Another point to which he wished to call attention was a regulation in the postal guide in regard to Inland money orders. This regulation ran, "Payment will be subject to the possession by the postmaster of sufficient funds." In the minds of some persons such a condition might give birth to a doubt as to the financial stability of the Exchequer. [Cries of "Oh."] Hon. Gentleman seemed to have a doubt about that. [AN HON. MEMBER: I should think so.] He quite agreed that there seemed to be no foundation for any such fear, but the hon. Member for Anglesey, in a speech he made at Oswestry in January, 1905, alluded to this subject, and said the regulation was evidence enough that they were getting perilously near a paper currency, which was one of the most dangerous events which could occur to any country. The hon. Member said, moreover, that the last Government had hokey-pokeyed the finance of the country, and was responsible for that condition of things. If the hon. Member for Anglesey was still of that opinion let him argue it out with the present Postmaster-General. He quoted that speech to show that such a statement as that contained in the regulation was likely to be used to create in the minds of certain people in the country a feeling of uneasiness. He should like to have the opinion of the Postmaster-General on this point.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith Burghs) asked, first, for information as to the progress being made with the laying of underground telegraph wires to the centres of commerce in Scotland, and, secondly, whether it was possible to extend the trunk telephone lines north of Inverness.

MR. DALZIEL (Kircaldy Burghs) said before the debate closed he should like to refer to one or two points which had not been mentioned. He wished to recommend to the right hon. Gentleman that in cases of appointment to the highest positions in the postal service, where other qualifications were equal, he should in Scotland give the preference to Scotsmen. [AN HON. MEMBER: "And to Yorkshiremen in Yorkshire."] He quite agreed that that should be the case if the Yorkshireman had the same qualifications as the other competitor, because his local knowledge would be useful. He also complained that the postal service to and from South Africa was very unsatisfactory, inasmuch as a reply to a letter from the Colonies could not be sent off without the loss of a week. He hoped the Postmaster-General would make some representations in the proper quarters that the South African mail should arrive on a Friday, and then letters in reply could be sent back on Saturday. In that way letters would arrive on a Friday. It was altogether wrong that letters should arrive on a Saturday when it was impossible to reply to them in time to catch the outgoing boat. The difference would be entirely obviated if the steamers kept going and did not deliberately slow down and take two days more than was necessary, in order to save coal. We were living at a time when it was a scandal that steamship passengers should have their voyage deliberately delayed for a couple of days for any such purpose. If it was not for that the letters might be received on a Thursday in ample time to transmit replies by the outgoing mail. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to give some concession on this point, and that he would also make representations to Durban, which he (Mr. Dalziel) believed was responsible for a portion of the subsidy. There was one other point to which he wished to allude, namely, the question of sending telegrams on Sundays. At the present time a telegram could only be sent on Sundays from the Charing Cross or the Central Post Office. It was extremely inconvenient for any one who had to reply to a telegram on that day always to have to go to Charing Cross or the Central Office. He therefore suggested that for the public convenience a certain number of the principal offices should be kept open for a certain number of hours for the purpose of receiving and despatching telegrams.

MR. FELL (Great Yarmouth) asked for some information as to the surcharges levied on foreign post cards. If there was any writing on a picture post card in the place where writing would ordinarily appear the recipient would be charged twopence and sometimes threepence. He wished to know whether something could not be done to abolish this charge, which could not result in much revenue to the Government, but which caused an infinite amount of annoyance to the recipients of these cards.

*SIR W. J. COLLINS (St. Pancras, N.) asked the Postmaster-General whether he could make any statement as to the dismissal of telegraph workers at Mount Pleasant. Some who had been there fifteen and twenty years had had notice to terminate their engagements, and they wished to know whether they were to be offered any equivalent employment and in what position they stood with regard to their compassionate allowances. His right hon. friend had, he knew, already considered the matter, and he believed that if the right hon. Gentleman could now see his way to make a public statement it would allay some misapprehension and relieve some disappointment.

MR. E. H. LAMB (Rochester) hoped the Postmaster-General would establish a uniform boundary for the Metropolitan area telephone system. A message from Gravesend cost sixpence, while one sent from Tilbury, on the other side of the river, cost only twopence. Consequently, there was always a strong temptation for people coming up the river to land on the Essex coast rather than at Gravesend for the purpose of getting into telephonic communication with London. He suggested that instead of the anomalous area that now existed the right hon. Gentleman should give a uniform area to the Metropolitan telephones, say of some thirty-six miles, so that towns in close proximity to London could have the privileges which other towns in the immediate vicinity had. He would also like to know whether it was a rule of the Post Office that when a head postmastership became vacant that position should not be given to the assistant postmaster. Quite recently the head mastership in Rochester became vacant and the assistant postmaster was not put into the position but some other person brought in from the outside. Was that to be a rule of the postal service ?

*MR. C. E. PRICE (Edinburgh, Central) complained of the way in which these higher appointments were filled up from London, with the result that there was no promotion. Two years ago, owing to representations that were made, one of these higher appointments was filled up by its being given to an assistant with the result that there was general promotion all through the office. It had a most injurious effect on any body of men to find that all the higher offices were a close corporation and that they could never obtain any of these higher positions. He was glad that the right hon. Gentleman had taken up the question of the illustrated price lists for Canada, but at the same time he would like to call attention to the difficulty with regard to Australia. In the last few years considerable restrictions had been placed upon illustrated price lists for Australia. He also called attention to the position of sub-postmasters, who were now on a fixed scale of salary, and unfortunately their work was not recognised on public holidays. The guarantee which sub-postmasters had to give for their assistants was also a matter which required looking into. He thought, too, that as they were not civil servants they should be free from political restrictions and should be allowed to exercise the ordinary rights of citizenship.

Sir F. BANBURY presumed the item of £21,290 for electric light generating plant implied that the department made their own electric light. That was no doubt right in days gone by, but with the great increase of electric lighting companies in London would it not be cheaper to obtain the light from one of them instead of maintaining costly plant ? It was well known that electricity generated on a small scale was extremely expensive. Unless the right hon. Gentleman had a very good argument to adduce against scrapping the plant, it would be better to obtain the light from a company.

*Mr. REES (Montgomery Boroughs) asked if it were possible to give a second delivery of letters in Montgomeryshire. There were many towns of a fair size which had only one delivery a day and which were very anxious to get another. The Cambrian Railway service was not good, though he did not complain of that, as the circumstances of the railway should be considered. But where the railway service allowed of a second delivery he thought such should be granted at places like Caersws, for instance. The complaint of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy Burghs with regard to the slowing down of steamers with the South African mails applied similarly to the mail services to and from India. If it could be possible to make an arrangement to obviate that it would be more satisfactory and would result in some saving of time, possibly at no great expense.

Mr. C. E. Price.

*Mr. W. T. WILSON (Lancashire, Westhoughton) thanked the Postmaster-General for his kindly reference to trade unions, and his announcement that the fair wages clause should be put in future contracts. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would put that clause into operation in all workshops and factories under his control, so that trade unionists would be able to accept employment therein. He also wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he would alter the regulations with regard to the charge made for circulars. Another question which called for consideration related to learners in post offices. In some of the provincial towns a great many learners were taken on by postmasters, and the result was they often had to wait a considerable time before being appointed as clerks.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON hoped the Committee would allow the vote to be passed to-night. In reply to the various criticisms, he would try to take them in the order they were put. First with regard to the question of the employment of ex-soldiers and ex-sailors. The hon. Member for Stoke had asked whether he was prepared to give a larger number of appointments to them. As Postmaster-General he entirely declined to take such action. The result of agreements with the Admiralty and War Office, made a few years ago, that 50 per cent. of certain appointments should be given to ex-soldiers and ex-sailors who were eligible had been that the Post Office had had to discharge a very large number of their boy messengers instead of giving them establishment appointments. That was a serious blot on the present postal system, and he should strongly resist any extension of the system, although, of course, he was in entire sympathy with the War Office point of view. He had been in communication with the War Office in regard to the matter, and hoped that by arrangement they might be able to obtain greater elasticity, so as to enable the Post Office in future to continue in their service a larger number of their boy messengers. With regard to the condition of Stoke Post Office, he was not at the present moment versed in the matter, but if he found that the post office was in the deplorable condition which the hon. member described he would certainly endeavour to do something—at all events not another ten years would be allowed to pass before something was done to remedy the evil. The hon. Gentleman had also raised a matter relating to wages which he would look into at once. If the hon. Member for the Westhoughton Division would mention any specific cases in which justice was not done to learners he would give the matter his attention. As to objectionable circulars, where they were open he had stopped them and had challenged legal action which had not been taken. But a sealed letter was a different thing. About a sealed letter there was felt to be a certain sanctity, and without an Act of Parliament he had no power to open such a letter, except with the written consent of a Secretary of State. He desired to assure the hon. Member who had raised this question that although he agreed with his views, at the present moment he was not able to carry his administrative action as far as he would like. Where the Post Office had evidence that illegal matter was being sent information was given to the police. The underground main telegraph line had now been carried to Glasgow, and the construction of the sub-lines. He had not had time to deal with the cash-on-delivery system; it was a thorny subject. His predecessor introduced a scheme with a great flourish of trumpets and had immediately to withdraw it. The last point he had to deal with was the question put by the junior Member for the City of London as to whether it would be cheaper for the Post Office to go to companies for the supply of electricity than to generate its own. The point had been carefully considered, and it was thought that it was cheaper to generate electricity. There had been no general principle laid down. Each case was considered on its merits.

MR. HICKS BEACH (Gloucestershire, Tewkesbury) asked whether the increase in the number of employes in the Post Office was due to a general increase in business. He also called attention to the absence of a Sunday post in some places, contending that it should be made universal in country districts or done away with altogether.

*MR. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton) expressed very great regret at the accusation of having written a letter which was a travesty of the truth, made against the secretary of Lloyd's by the Postmaster-General. Sir Henry Hozier had occupied a distinguished position in the Army, and had rendered great service to the commercial community in the position which he at present held. It was unfortunate that the right hon. Gentleman had been betrayed into making the accusation. He regretted that they had not had the advantage of hearing what the House of Commons thought on re-consideration of a certain measure recently returned to this House from the House of Lords. He was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman had been content to say "Ditto" to his predecessors in regard to the matter of wireless telegraphy. In dealing with this intensely valuable means of communication, not only to the whole commercial and maritime community, but also to the nation in times of war, all that the right hon. Gentleman could do was to say, "Let us go on as we did a few years ago." The Minister in charge of this difficult and important matter should not tie the hands of Parliament, and merely continue the arrangements he found when he entered upon office. He should ask the advice of Parliament as to the steps he should take.

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: That is a question of legislation. You cannot attack the Postmaster-General with regard to a matter of legislation.

*MR. CLAUDE HAY said he was betrayed into a phrase which did not convey his meaning. He wished to say that in the whole course of the debate the right hon. Gentleman had not given a shadow of an indication of any progressive method of administration in respect to wireless telegraphy. If this matter were allowed to lapse under the existing state of things, and unless it was ruthlessly dealt with by the Postmaster-General, the country might be landed in the same mess as former Postmasters-General had landed them in connection with the telephone and telegraphs. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to say definitely what were his intentions, not in the way of legislation, but of administration on the important subject of wireless telegraphy.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON said that in view of the important conference to take place in the autumn he did not think it his business to lay down at present any new rules. His policy was to prevent any monopoly and to give a free hand at present to the various inventors. He had issued licences to various companies applying for them, and four stations were going to be started by the Post Office to experiment as to the system likely to be the best. He did not withdraw what he had said in reference to an absolutely unprovoked attack on his predecessor being a travesty of the truth.

*MR. MEYSEY-THOMPSON (Staffordshire, Handsworth) said he wished to make a special appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to find employment in his Department for old soldiers after they left the Army. Their training in the Army fitted them well for Post Office work. He pointed out that while the messenger boys' claim should be by no means overlooked, it must be remembered that the soldier who had spent in the service of his country some of the best years of his life, the years when it was most easy for him to establish himself in some regular employment, was apt to be thrown out of employment at an age when employers were disinclined to take him in preference to a younger man. He drew attention to the fact that if it was wanted to have the best class of men in the Army, and to do justice to those who were willing to give their lives for their country, we must not overlook their claims to considerate treatment on their re-entry into civil employment.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.) said that there was a large increase of £10,000 a year in respect of the conveyance of mails by road, and a great decrease in respect of the conveyance of the mails by rail. He asked whether it would not be possible for the Postmaster-General to improve the system of delivery of letters and telegrams in the country. If a telegram was sent from this House he sometimes reached the place to which it was sent before the telegram was delivered.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON said that he would give attention to the representations of the hon. Gentleman.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next; Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

PUBLIC TRUSTEE [EXPENSES].

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That it is expedient to authorise the charge on the Consolidated Fund of such sums as may be required to make good any liabilities incurred by the Public Trustee, or his officers, appointed under any Act of the present session to provide for the appointment of a Public Trustee, and to authorise the payment, out of moneys provided by Parliament, of the salaries or remuneration of the Public Trustee and his officers, and of other Expenses incurred by them in pursuance of such Act."—(Mr. Whiteley.)

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House be now adjourned."

MR. KEIR HARDIE said he desired to appeal once more to the Home Secretary in regard to the sentence passed on Miss Billington, so that an inquiry should be made into all the facts of the case with a view to the remission of the sentence. It appeared that that morning a number of women desired to interview the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and for that purpose they approached his residence, as he understood, in a peaceable manner. The police interfered, and in consequence of the persistence of the women in going into the Chancellor of the Exchequer's house, four of them were arrested. Some of these women were sentenced to a fine of £10, or the alternative of two month's imprisonment. He thought it would be admitted that a sentence of that kind was out of all proportion to the offence committed. He invited the right hon. the Home Secretary to make an inquiry into all the facts of the case with a view to the remission of a part of the sentence. Unless something of that kind were done, the object which the magistrate probably had in view in imposing such a heavy sentence, viz., that of deterring others from pursuing a like line of conduct, would defeat itself. The feeling among people of all opinions and in every part of the country was that the sentence was unduly harsh. If the right hon. Gentleman used the power vested in him with a view to the revision and reduction of the sentence he would be doing an act of justice in itself, and one which would meet with approval from large numbers of people outside the House.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.) said that at present he was afraid that he could give no other answer than that which he had given at Question time. He had no additional information on the subject. Of course, he would give the qestion all the consideration it deserved. If the hon. Member would follow his suggestion and put down a question for Monday, he would make inquiry into all the circumstances of the case, and endeavour to answer the Question.

MR. KEIR HARDIE: Will the right hon. Gentleman be able to give an answer by Monday?

MR. GLADSTONE said he would try to give an answer by Monday, but as he was not aware of the circumstances of the case at present, it was possible that he might have to ask the hon. Gentleman to postpone it.

*MR. BYLES (Salford, N.) said he wished to support the appeal of the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil. He did not approve of the conduct of the women, and he thought they were injuring their cause, but to send anyone, much more a woman, to prison for two months without that person having committed any moral offence was a discredit to English tribunals and English judicial methods. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would see his way to inquire into the matter.

*MR. MADDISON (Burnley) said that while hon. Members held the view that the right hon. Gentleman should inquire into this case, it should be clearly stated that if the ordinary procedure had been carried out in the court for a similar offence there ought to be no difference whatever made. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil had spoken of these "female hooligans" as seeking an interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but he was simply playing with words. These women had declared over and over again that the Chancellor of the Exchequer "has windows," and they had deliberately urged their comrades to go to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's house. It was a deliberate plan; they had been interviewed in the Press, and again and again they had said that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not seen the end of it. Womanhood, indeed, had really been abominably outraged by their conduct. The hon. Member for Merthyr would have served his cause very much better if at an earlier stage he had used his influence to induce these women to act in something like a decent fashion. No real working women would have disgraced themselves in the way these women had done. They were now in their proper place—a police court.

Mr. SHACKLETON (Lancashire, Clitheroe) said he did not associate himself in any way with the action of those women. He thought it was foolish. But all the same he thought the speech of the hon. Member for Burnley was entirely uncalled for. While he agreed that it was not an accurate description of the proceedings to say that the women were merely asking for an interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would consider the appeal made by his hon. friend the Member for Merthyr Tydvil. Two months imprisonment for such an offence was too heavy a punishment.

Mr. ARTHUR HENDERSON (Durham, Barnard Castle) said he sincerely trusted the Home Secretary would not be influenced by the speech of the hon. Member for Burnley. However much they might wish to deprecate—and he did deprecate them most strongly — the tactics of certain of the representatives of the women's enfranchisement movement, he ventured to say that no man would be prepared to justify the excessive punishment that had been inflicted in this particular case.

Mr. Maddison.

Mr. EUGENE WASON (Clackmannan and Kinross) said that the magistrate ought not to be attacked for having performed his duty. In his opinion, the fine was not excessive. If the fine was paid, these ladies would be released, and he believed that, if they promised not to repeat the offence, the fine would be paid for them.

Mr. SEDDON (Lancashire, Newton) said that the hon. Member for Burnley, in his vicious attack on those women, had been guilty of a misstatement. Two of those women were working women. Miss Kenny was a cotton operative; and the other was a school teacher. He would leave the hon. Member for Burnley to discuss with his constituents whether these women were "female hooligans."

Mr. J. WARD said he wished to join in the appeals for clemency in this case. He did not think that a severe sentence would have the desired effect of deterring these women from their ill-advised action. If the Home Secretary were to try and modify, if not to wipe out altogether, the punishment that had been passed in this case, he believed it would have much better results than the sentence that had been imposed.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee."—(Earl Beauchamp.)

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: My Lords, before the House resolves itself into Committee I desire to say a few words upon this Bill, as circumstances over which I had no control prevented my being present to take part in the debate on the Second Reading. I do not propose to utter one jarring note after the harmonious discussion which took place upon the last stage. I concur entirely in all that was said by my noble friend the Leader of the House, and I sincerely hope that with the disappearance of the property qualification in England we shall not see the dignity or efficiency of the Bench impaired.

The property qualification was instituted many years ago for the purpose of preventing any possible corruption on the part of those appointed as magistrates. I think I am justified in saying that our system of an unpaid magistracy has worked exceedingly well for many years, and to my mind it would be a very deplorable thing if, owing to assimilating the qualification in England to that in Ireland and Scotland, the dignity of the Bench were lowered. It is, therefore, with great regret that I should see appointments to the local benches made simply as a reward for services of a political character. I have read with great interest the debate which took place in your Lordships' House a week ago, and I noticed that in the very lucid, and may I say moderate, speech of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack the statement was made that Members of the Party to which I have the honour to belong predominate on the Bench. I do not deny that. My own experience tells me that that is the case, but I think it is generally found that the reason for that is that those who have been more specially qualified to occupy a seat on the Bench in the various districts have as a rule belonged to that Party.

I have had the honour of being His Majesty's representative in the County Down in Ireland, and until recently in the city of Belfast, and I have always endeavoured to appoint gentlemen to the Bench, regardless of what their political or religious views were, so long as they could perform satisfactorily the duties of the position. But in the County Down I have been obliged to select Protestants because I have experienced difficulty, in that Protestant county, in finding gentlemen of the opposite faith who were in every way qualified for the fulfilment of the duties. The debate which took place the other day was undoubtedly a very interesting one, but I confess I read it with a certain amount of surprise. I am one of those who consider that an ounce of practice is worth a ton of theory, and I had hoped that we should have heard from someone how justices of the peace discharge their duties in Ireland and Scotland where no property qualification is insisted upon. I had hoped that the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack would have given us his experience on that point.

Of Scotland I know very little, but I have had some experience with regard to Ireland, and in the part with which I am particularly associated there is no complaint whatever to be made of those appointed to the Bench. But I am sorry I cannot speak in the same congratulatory tone as to the south of Ireland. It is well known that in the south of Ireland, between 1892 and 1895, there were appointed a large number of magistrates solely on political grounds. I believe that will not be denied. They are now recognised as Morley's magistrates; and I do not know that they added very much to the credit of the various benches to which they were appointed. I have heard it said that some of the gentlemen appointed to benches in the south of Ireland had themselves in previous years appeared before those benches. I have also heard that so little confidence was felt in those gentlemen that the inhabitants would rather appear before the resident magistrate. There is one occurrence I should like to bring before your Lordships for which I can vouch, though I will not mention any names. The present Lord Chancellor, of whom I speak with the greatest possible respect, in the days to which I allude sent a list of names to a Lord-Lieutenant in the south of Ireland asking him to recommend them to be justices of the peace for his county. The Lord-Lieutenant asked for an interview, and explained that he could not take upon himself the responsibility of recommending those gentlemen, as many of them had themselves appeared before the magistrates.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord LOREBURN): The noble Marquess is referring to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: Yes, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland. The Lord-Lieutenant came upon two names and absolutely declined to recommend them. The Lord Chancellor urged that he should do so, but the Lord-Lieutenant still persisted in his refusal. "Why not recommend them?" asked the Lord Chancellor. "Because," replied the Lord-Lieutenant, "they died a fortnight ago of delirium tremens, one of them a bankrupt." I mention this to show what might be the condition of things on the Bench if appointments are made to the magistracy purely as a reward for political services. The dignity of the Bench should be maintained, and I mention this instance to show that if we do assimilate the condition of things in England to that in Ireland, we must not go to the extreme of rewarding political services by putting on the Bench gentlemen who are not qualified. I trust that Lords-Lieutenant will be very careful in submitting names to the Lord Chancellor. I do not oppose the Bill now before your Lordships, but I have brought this matter forward in the hope that nothing will be done to impair the dignity and efficiency of the Bench.

VISCOUNT ST. ALDWYN: My Lords, my noble friend has referred to the appointment of magistrates, which may no doubt often have been pressed on the Lord Chancellor of the day or the Lord-Lieutenant of a county, on account of political services. But there is one point in connection with this question which does not seem to be touched by the Bill, to which I should like to call your Lordships' attention. As Member for a large city, I have often had the names of gentlemen brought before me for recommendation to the Lord Chancellor, and those recommendations have usually come, by arrangement, from both political parties. As a rule, I think, there is a feeling that appointments of this kind should be recommended, to some extent at any rate, on political grounds, I do not say in the minds of those who make them, but in the minds of those who recommend them. I think everyone must have noticed, in looking into this subject as it affects the English counties and boroughs, that there is an extraordinarily high proportion of names of persons who appear on the lists but who never do a stroke of work. They probably have been appointed for some such reason as I have alluded to.

These persons when appointed probably thought of nothing beyond the fulfilment of their desire to have what is locally considered the great honour of writing "J.P." after their name; they never thought that the honour also carried with it the fulfilment of duties. If it were possible for the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack or for Lords-Lieutenant from time to time to remove such names from the list, I think that a great reform might be achieved.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY: My Lords, when the duty devolved upon me of exercising the office now discharged by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack I repeatedly requested that an undertaking should be given by the person appointed to the magistracy to do his duty as justice of the peace, and although I have not actually removed the names of those who have not done their duty I have caused letters to be written to them from time to time pointing out that if they did not do their duty they were not fit to be magistrates and should be removed, and I have found that the hint has been invariably adopted. Undoubtedly the person appointed should undertake to perform the duties.

*LORD ASHBOURNE: My Lords, I should like to say one or two words in view of what has fallen from my noble friend Lord St. Aldwyn. I entirely concur in what he says as to the difficulty of procuring the regular attendance of magistrates on the Bench, and I have been impressed in Ireland with the fact that this is a growing difficulty in the manning of the county benches. A somewhat different system prevails in Ireland from that which obtains in England with reference to the appointment of magistrates, and I am not sure that my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack might not find it desirable to inquire of the very efficient officer who is in charge of that branch of the Lord Chancellor's duties in Ireland what are the actual details connected with the appointments there.

For a great many years we have had no such property qualification in Ireland as that which has existed in England; but the custom has been, ever since I was first appointed Lord Chancellor and for many years before, for I did not initiate it, to send to Lords-Lieutenant in Ireland forms which they would forward when they desired to invite a gentleman to join the magistracy. This form, which would be filled up in the candidate's own handwriting, would contain a statement as to his name, age, residence and property in that particular county or in other counties, and information on various other matters which would be of assistance both to the Lord-Lieutenant and to the Lord Chancellor when the time came for considering his fitness for appointment. One of the questions asked of a candidate was as to the petty sessional districts he proposed to attend, and personally I have very rarely sanctioned more than three. Another question asked was whether, if appointed to the magistracy, he proposed to give a regular attendance in the petty sessional districts named. All these questions are in the direction of getting that regular attendance which my noble friend has indicated.

My noble and learned friend Lord Halsbury has stated that he occasionally directed the attention of those who were negligent to their duties as justices of the peace, but I am afraid it is not very easy to secure compliance with such requests. My attention on one occasion was directed by Lord St. Aldwyn when Chief Secretary for Ireland to this matter, and I applied myself to ascertaining those magistrates who had gone away and those who had ceased to take any part in the work of the county, and I was thus able to remove many names that had become perfectly useless so as to obtain a more effective list. The matter is one beset with a great deal of difficulty and requires much tact and prudence.

LORD HENEAGE: I should like to ask whether the law is not perfectly clear on this point, that clerks of the peace are obliged to make out a list of magistrates who have not attended for two years, and that these magistrates are put on the non resident list.

THE EARL OF DARTMOUTH: I may state, in view of the observations of the noble and learned Lord the late Lord Chancellor for Ireland, that personally I have never appointed any magistrates without asking for the information referred to, and an undertaking that the persons whom I recommended would perform their fair share of the duties attached to the position, That undertaking has invariably been given, but I am sorry to say it has not always been carried out. With regard to the remarks of my noble friend below me, I think one word ought to be said in defence of the magistrates themselves. It is this, that many of our benches are now so crowded that there is not seating accommodation for all of them.

LORD HEMPHILL: My Lords, I have had considerable experience of the magistracy of Ireland and full opportunity of knowing how the justices generally have discharged their duties. I am not aware that there have been any complaints at all against the unpaid magistracy of Ireland, either in regard to non-attendance or insufficient attention to the discharge of their duties; and if there were any grounds for supposing that improper persons had under the existing law in Ireland been appointed to the Bench surely instances could have been adduced to your Lordships. I would remind noble Lords that the existing property qualification is not of such a nature as to prevent the abuses apprehended. If corruption, political or of any other nature, could creep into the appointment of magistrates the existing qualification would not be sufficient to prevent it. Therefore it occurs to me that no argument whatever has been advanced against the present Bill.

No qualification has been necessary in Ireland for more than a century at least, and after long experience, having lived all my life in Ireland and had the opportunity of knowing how the magistrates act in the southern counties, I can hardly call to mind any instance where abuses have been shown to exist. If we search the records of the Court of the King's Bench in Ireland it will appear that it is very rarely indeed that the decisions of the magistrates are called in question, except in occasional differences of opinion on questions of legal niceties. I think, therefore, that this is one of the cases in which, if possible, the laws of the three countries should be assimilated, and there is no fear of abuse. It is necessary that the people should have confidence in the magisterial administration of justice, and it is desirable therefore that the justices should not all be of the same way of political thinking.

THE EARL OF MEATH: The noble and learned Lord the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland has informed your Lordships that in Ireland there is a form which has to be filled up by the applicant and is sent by His Majesty's Lord-Lieutenant to the Lord Chancellor. That is perfectly correct, but I wish I could say that it was of much use. Unfortunately, although the applicants do sign this form and say they will give as much of their time to the actual work on the bench as is compatible with their other duties, they do not fulfil their promise. The result is, at all events in my own county, that at least one half of the magistrates do not attend at all. I always feel most reluctant to recommend anybody to the Lord Chancellor, because I know that the bench is already overcrowded. Yet at the same time there are many whose claims are brought before me who ought to be magistrates, but I cannot see my way to recommend them. I am sure I am speaking what is in the minds of a great number of Lords-Lieutenant in the populous districts both of Ireland and of England when I say that it would be conducive to the public service if some arrangement could be made by which magistrates who did not attend should automatically cease to be magistrates after a certain time.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, the noble Marquess who spoke first appealed to me to say something with regard to one or two points. As to the point raised by the noble Viscount, that there ought to be some means by which magistrates who do not attend should cease to be justices of the peace without any reflection upon them, I agree that this suggestion is well worthy of consideration. I am afraid, however, that I am myself disqualified from expressing any opinion on the subject, because I am one of the delinquents. I was appointed eleven years ago a magistrate for the county of Kent. I did not give any undertaking that I would attend, but the real pressure of work has prevented me from putting in one solitary appearance from that day to this. Therefore, my first duty would be to remove myself.

There ought, I think, to be an understanding, if not an undertaking, that when a magistrate accepts the position it should be with the intention of discharging the duties. It is quite correct that there is a constant correspondence on matters relating to the magistracy going on in the Lord Chancellor's office, and there are frequent requests to know whether gentlemen intend to perform their duties or are willing to be removed from the Commission of the Peace, but they never display any alacrity to be removed. With regard to the absence of qualification in Scotland and its effect, it must be remembered that in Scotland justices of the peace have fewer duties to discharge than in England; the Scottish analogy, therefore, is not absolutely to the mark. I believe the absence of qualification makes no difference there, nor would it make any difference here. It must be remembered that there is no qualification necessary now in great boroughs like Birmingham, Liverpool and Leeds. The magistrates in the boroughs are appointed without qualification; they discharge most important duties, and I have never heard that the absence of the property qualification has made any difference.

I do not think there is any real advantage in any money test. It is not a question of how much money a man has, but whether he is a man of education, of firmness of character, and one who is looked up to and respected by his neighbours. About the relations of politics and the magistracy, I wish there were no such thing, and that we heard no more about the political opinions of the magistrates than we do of the political opinions of doctors. But we all know the actual situation, and it would be uncandid if we did not admit it. There is an enormous preponderance of one political opinion on the Bench in the counties. I cannot accept the suggestion thrown out by the noble Marquess who spoke first that persons of the Conservative party are more likely to administer justice than those of the other Party. Personally I do not think there is any difference between fair-minded men on one side of politics and the other. My feeling is that this preponderance causes a sense of injustice which ought to be redressed. For my part I have no sympathy whatever with the idea of appointing as magistrates, as a reward for political services, undeserving persons. I really do wish to see the administration of justice in this country carried out in a way that will secure the affection and the respect of the people at large, and I would not be a party to placing on the Bench a man who was not an honest man and a proper person for such a position.

House in Committee (according to order).

[The Earl of ONSLOW in the Chair].

Clause 1 agreed to.

THE EARL OF DARTMOUTH suggested that the words requiring residence within seven miles should be struck out, and that a man should not be disqualified for being a justice of the peace for a county on account of residence outside the county area. What happened, especially in large industrial districts, was that the persons engaged in them who were most qualified to act as magistrates resided elsewhere. In these days of rapid locomotion seven miles was practically no distance at all; it was merely a twenty minutes journey in a motor-car. He therefore hoped, before the Third Reading stage was taken, the Local Government Board would consider a provision in this form—that a person, if otherwise qualified and having a large interest in an industrial centre, should not be disqualified as a justice of peace on account of residence outside the county area. He thought that would be a far more satisfactory provision.

LORD HERRIES said there was some danger of the county bench being swamped by the incursion of gentlemen who did not live in the county. He thought they were quite sufficiently governed by the towns already, without enabling gentlemen resident in the towns to become county magistrates and interfere in the administration of justice in the counties. He agreed that there were circumstances under which it was to the advantage of the public that gentlemen living outside the county should be appointed magistrates, but he was afraid that if the clause were passed in its present form it would open the door too widely. There would be the danger of a great many magiatrates being appointed from outside, with the result that the county magistrates would be swamped. He suggested that the clause should read—

> "A person, if otherwise qualified, may be appointed a justice of the peace for any county, notwithstanding that he does not reside in the county, if he resides within seven miles thereof and if it is for the public interest in the administration of justice that such an appointment should be made."

THE EARL OF JERSEY hoped the rather vague Amendment suggested by Lord Dartmouth would not be accepted. He was of opinion that those who sat on the local bench should be gentlemen residing close by. They were more likely to attend regularly, and to be in real touch with the neighbourhood. It rested with the Lord Chancellor and the Lord-Lieutenant whether too many magistrates were appointed, and he thought that in this matter both would be guided by what they considered best for the county.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR thought that the Amendment suggested by Lord Dartmouth was too vague, and that the clause as it stood would be more useful. The direction to the Lord Chancellor was in the Statute of Henry V., that justices of the peace henceforth to be appointed within the counties of England should be "most sufficient persons dwelling in the same county." That was the old law, and he imagined that it was as binding upon him as it was upon his predecessor in the time of Henry V. The persons to be appointed should be competent, trustworthy, and reliable individuals.

THE EARL OF DARTMOUTH said he did not move his Amendment. He only offered it as a very humble suggestion, and was sorry it had not met with any favour.

Clause 3:—

THE EARL OF DARTMOUTH moved an Amendment stipulating that solicitors, "if otherwise qualified," might be appointed. According to the clause as it stood, a person, if otherwise qualified, might be appointed, but a solicitor could apparently be appointed whether he was qualified or not. Those who lived in the counties did not want to have any cuckoos in the home nest, and it seemed to him that this suggestion of dumping down outside solicitors on local benches was not one that would meet with approval. It seemed to him to extend the principal of Free Trade in a manner that was never intended by the originators of that system, and he thought that without treading on anybody's corns in this particular instance they might ask to be allowed to adopt the principle of Protection.

Amendment moved—

> "In page 1, line 11, after the word 'solicitor' to insert the words 'if otherwise qualified.'"—(The Earl of Dartmouth.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR did not understand the clause to mean that solicitors, merely because they were solicitors, could be appointed without any other qualification. He would not enter into the point as to whether or not that was a true construction, for he saw no objection to accepting the Amendment in order to make it quite clear that no such special privilege was intended to be accorded to any particular class.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY said that probably the reason why the words in the clause were used was that a solicitor was, under certain circumstances, disqualified, and it was proposed to remove that disqualification.

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

Clause 3, as amended, agreed to.

Remaining clause agreed to.

Bill recommitted to the Standing Committee, and to be printed as amended. (No. 135.)

ECCLESIASTICAL DISCIPLINE COMMISSION.

*LORD KINNAIRD rose to ask His Majesty's Government—1. If they can explain to the House the cause of the repeated delays in presenting the Report of the Commission on Ecclesiastical Discipline to His Majesty the King, and why it has not been presented before Whitsuntide as promised in March in another place? 2. Would the Government endeavour to hasten this Report, as it would be of the greatest value during the Education debate? 3. Does not the prolonged delay involve the Government in considerable additional expense? 4. Could the Government also further the matter by recommending to the Commission the advisability of getting the volumes of evidence or some of them printed off and bound at once, so that there will be no printing delays after the Commission have made their report? The noble Lord said: My Lords, I must apologise for not being in my place to put the Question last week, and I am very sorry if my absence caused any of your Lordships any inconvenience. There was a long list of notices on the Paper, and I thought my Question would not be reached until after five o'clock. When I got down to the House, however, your Lordships had adjourned. I fully recognise the difficulty of this subject and that the amount of evidence given before the Commission was considerable. I feel that those who have given so much time and thought to this matter deserve our best thanks and gratitude. The fact that the Chairman of the Commission was called away on a very important inquiry connected with our Indian Empire may have caused delay; but I have put the Question down in order to allay any feeling in people's minds that there has been considerable delay in this matter; and especially at this juncture, when there is considerable anxiety with reference to the education of the country, it is desirable to have some authoritative statement as to whether the numbers of those clergy who are disobeying the law of the Church and of the land as given by the Low Church Party are correct. The Report, I think, may influence a good many people in judging how far those clergy who do not obey the law ought to be given considerable power under the Education Bill in educating the children in our elementary schools. I should be very sorry if the wording of my Question in any way led to the impression that there had been needless delay in the bringing out of the Report.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (The Marquess of RIPON): My Lords, I am very glad that the remarks of the noble Lord who has just sat down have to a certain extent removed the somewhat unpleasant impression which the wording of his Question as it stands on the Paper was calculated to cause. I certainly did feel that, evidently unintentionally, the noble Lord's Question implied distrust, not to say suspicion, of the proceedings of the Commission, which I believe to be entirely without justification. I do not think, from the information in my possession, that there has been any avoidable or unnecessary delay in the presentation of the Report. When we recollect that the noble Viscount opposite, Lord St. Aldwyn, presided over the Commission, we shall not be likely to believe that he is a man to let the grass grow under his feet. At least I have never formed that conception of his character, and I can certainly say that His Majesty's Government do not feel that there has been any undue delay in the matter.

When my noble friend opposite, Lord Kinnaird, speaks of a promise given to present the Report before Whitsuntide, he puts the matter very much more strongly than the facts justify. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister gave no promise, but expressed a hope, and all the hopes which one expresses are not to be converted into promises, for life consists very greatly of unrealised hopes. With respect to the date at which the Report will appear, I think it will be published soon enough to satisfy the noble Lord. I will not, however, venture, as a hope has been treated as a promise, to express an opinion on this subject, but will leave it to the noble Viscount opposite, who, no doubt, will speak. As to expense, the cost involved by the difference between the presentation of the Report at the beginning of June and the end of June is infinitesimal. I am told that it is nothing more than the salary of the Secretary, which may be prolonged for a week or two. The question of cost is, therefore, altogether unworthy of being considered. I believe that steps have been taken to carry out the wishes expressed in the fourth inquiry of the noble Lord. Efforts are being made to produce the evidence as quickly as possible, either with or immediately after the publication of the Report. I quite agree that this is highly desirable in a matter of this kind.

*VISCOUNT ST. ALDWYN: My Lords perhaps, as I had the honour of presiding over this Commission, I may make a few observations in reply to the Question placed on the Paper by the noble Lord. I appreciate the sentences with which he commenced his observations, but I am bound to say that it is difficult to reconcile them with the terms of his Question. The first paragraph of the Question contains two untrue statements. In the first place, it is not true to say that any promise was given that this Report would be presented before Whitsuntide. All that was ever said was what the Prime Minister was authorised by me, on behalf of the Commission, to say in the House of Commons in February last,† that I had hopes that we might finish the consideration of our Report before Whitsuntide. In the second place, it is not true to say that there have been repeated delays in presenting the Report; not only have there been no repeated delays, but there has been no delay at all.

I do not know whether the noble Lord has ever served his country upon a Royal Commission. Perhaps his not having done so may excuse the way in which he has referred to those who have given gratuitous services in a difficult and most unpleasant duty. Personally, having myself given services of this kind on many occasions, I may say that I have never known a Commission which worked harder, with a greater desire to bring its labours to as early a termination as was consistent with their proper performance, than this Commission. We commenced our inquiry a little more than two years ago. The previous Ritual Commission took nearly five years in considering the matters referred to them. This Commission was composed of fourteen members, including three members of the Episcopal Bench, three Judges, and three Members of Parliament; and the remaining members were all men busily engaged in their respective avocations. I venture to say there was not one member on that Commission who could not be called a very busy man. In those two years we sat on something like 120 days—long sittings on each day; and of course many of us devoted a great deal of time besides that to the work of the Commission. That is what we did.

Now it is suggested that there have been delays. I repudiate that suggestion as strongly as it is possible for me to do so, consistent with language proper to be used in your Lordships' House. But that is not all. The noble Lord has insinuated in the terms of his Question that the delay has been needless, and that it has been done purposely in order to prevent the country from obtaining in the debates on the Education Bill whatever information might be gathered from the Report and evidence of this Commission. I do not know whether the noble Lord really means to make that insinuation.

*LORD KINNAIRD: I did not mean to make the insinuation.

*VISCOUNT ST. ALDWYN: I very gladly accept that denial. But such an insinuation has been made in the gutter Press, and I can only say it is an absolute lie. I can use no other term to characterise it. I do not know—and I do not very much care—what effect anything in the Report or the evidence given before the Commission may have in the debates on the Education Bill. But this I do know, speaking for myself, that nothing could be more unjust, or more illogical than to appreciate the denominational teaching generally given in Church of England schools by the misguided action of a certain number of clergymen, very few in number as compared with the total body of the clergy of the Church.

With regard to our proceedings, I am thankful to say they have been brought to a termination. Our Report is, I am afraid, rather a large volume. It has been unanimously agreed to, without reservation or dissent on the part of a single Commissioner. It has been signed by all the Commissioners but one—the Lord Chief Justice, who was unable to sign it at our meeting because he was on Circuit in Somersetshire. His signature will be obtained either to-day or to-morrow. The Report will, I believe, be presented to the Home Office on Monday for submission to His Majesty, and, of course, it will rest with the Home Office how soon it is circulated. The evidence, the index, and the rest of the Papers will be presented, I believe, in a fortnight from Monday next, and will be available—of course by the permission of the printers, who are rather difficult to deal with in these matters—as soon as may be possible to the public after that date. I hope I have said enough to show that we, the members of this Royal Commission, have done our work to the best of our ability, and that we do not deserve the gross insinuation contained in the Question of the noble Lord.

RESERVE FORCES BILL.

Order of the day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3ª."—(The Earl of Portsmouth.)

*LORD HAVERSHAM: My Lords, before this Bill is read a third time, I wish to say a few words upon it. The proposal herein contained will go down to another place fortified by the opinion of perhaps the strongest man who could be summoned in support of it. I refer to the late Sir Robert Herbert, who was for so long Under-Secretary for the Colonies. Seven years ago I made the proposal to Sir Robert Herbert which is contained in this Bill, and suggested that he should use the machinery of the Empire League to obtain an opinion in favour of the establishment of a Reserve in the Colonies. Sir Robert Herbert took up the question with his usual eagerness, and promised me that the Committee of the Empire League should inquire into the details. I will read his letter—

> "Your suggestion as to the enrollment of men in the Colonies in the Imperial Reserve is, I think, sound and practical, and I will bring it before the Council of the Empire League. After the present South African war is over it might be possible to settle a number of time expired soldiers on the land, giving them grants on condition of their being ready for service anywhere."

I am glad that this proposal, so far as His Majesty's Government are concerned, is about to be carried out.

But this Bill does various other things which are equally useful. In the first place, it enables the Government to pay men of the Reserve in the Colonies. During my time at the War Office we were not allowed even to pay pensions outside the United Kingdom. That difficulty is now removed. The second great advantage is that we shall be enabled to enlist men direct into the Reserve. I understand that there are no less than 3,000 men in India who are now in the Reserve, but who are not under any control whatever. These men will be under the same control in the future as Reserve men at home, and will be a strong addition to the Reserve Forces of this country.

Lastly, there is a provision to give greater elasticity to the various branches of the Reserve. At present it is impossible for a man in the Cavalry Reserve to serve in the Remount Department or to join the Mounted Infantry, for this reason, that both of those services are regarded as dismounted services. It is of the greatest possible importance that these men should be so employed. Many of them are incapable any longer of serving in the Cavalry and would be of the greatest possible service in the Remount Department and in other ways. It may be said that it is a difficult thing to make a cavalryman into an infantryman and vice versa, but we may be sure that the authorities will not use this power unless it is of service to them. This Bill will also give us a much larger Reserve in the Colonies than we have had before. It will enable us to use our Colonial Army in a much more effective way, and it will create a greater connection between the Colonies and the mother country. Above all, the Bill will enable the Colonies in time of stress to come forward with a much larger Reserve to aid our forces in matters which may be of equal importance to them as to ourselves. I hope the Bill will go down to the other House fortified by the sanction of the Government and that they will use all their efforts to secure its passage into law this session.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The EARL OF PORTSMOUTH): My Lords, I should like to express a few words of thanks to my noble friend for what he has said on behalf of this Bill. I think I ought also to say, in fairness, that the reason the Bill has made such satisfactory progress in your Lordships' House is not only the merit of the Bill itself, but also the fact that it is in almost all respects the same Bill as was introduced by the late Government and which your Lordships passed through all its stages. It was one of the Bills which, owing to pressure of business at the end of last session, was massacred in the House of Commons. I hope your Lordships will give the Bill a Third Reading. It will then go down to the House of Commons with the necessary Amendments that have been introduced, and I trust there is every prospect of the Bill being passed into law this Session.

On Question, Bill read 3ª, and passed. with the Amendments, and sent to the Commons.

LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES.

LORD DENMAN: My Lords, on behalf of my noble friend who represents the Board of Trade in this House (the Earl of Granard) I beg to move that the Earl Beauchamp be added to the Select Committee. I am given to understand that owing to the regrettable absence, through indisposition, of Lord Balfour of Burleigh it has been found necessary to obtain the services of another Member.

Moved, "That the Earl Beauchamp be added to the Select Committee."—(Lord Denman).

On Question, Motion agreed to.

SERVIA.

LORD NEWTON: My Lords, I rise to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is prepared to make a statement with reference to the renewal of diplomatic relations with Servia. When the barbarous murder of the late King and Queen of Servia took place, and when the perpetrators of that crime were not only not punished, but actually rewarded by high positions and influential commands, Lord Lansdowne, who was at that time Foreign Minister, withdrew our representative at Belgrade, and since that period diplomatic relations between the two countries have been suspended. This action of His Majesty's Government was not only unanimously approved here, but it produced an excellent effect throughout the Continent, possibly owing to the fact that some Powers entered into a kind of ignoble competition as to which should be first to recognise the regicide Government. I think you could have no better evidence of the wisdom of the action of his Majesty's Government than that the Servian Government has been endeavouring ever since to resume diplomatic relations with this country.

The attitude of the late Government was something of this kind. They intimated that so long as the Servian Government identified itself with the regicides they preferred to have no communications with it. No demand was made that any punishment should be inflicted upon them, and I venture to think this was a wise reservation, because if we had endeavoured to insist upon punishment these men would probably have been converted into patriotic martyrs. I think it was pointed out that His Majesty's Government, naturally regarding Servia as an independent country which it was not our business to interfere with, thought it ought to recognise its own duty in the matter, and that we should not maintain any official relations with it until the Servian Government had done what was obviously fitting and right under the circumstances.

The Servian Government continued to make inquiries as to what our wishes were in the matter, and on April 11th of this year Sir Edward Grey, departing in a very slight measure from the attitude previously adopted by this country, announced in another place that until the regicide officers were removed the question of reopening diplomatic relations with Servia could not be discussed. This clearly meant the retirement of eighteen persons who were prominently associated with the crime in question, and who, I believe, had actually personally taken part in the murder. The then Servian Prime Minister submitted to the king a decree proposing to place eleven of the principal regicides on the retired list. The monarch, however, preferred rather than grant this demand to accept the resignation of the Prime Minister and his Government. Thereupon appeared on the scene another Government, and the new Prime Minister appears to have also approached the Foreign Office through intermediaries, who, I understand, were Italians.

Unofficial inquiries were made with the view of ascertaining how many retirements would satisfy our views, and somehow or other it was conveyed that if five of the regicides were retired, and retired in such a manner as to indicate clearly that the Servian Government disapproved of their crime and dissociated itself entirely from them, nominal diplomatic relations with Servia would be resumed. It was clearly intended that the Servian Government should distinctly dissociate itself from these men, and that they should be retired under such circumstances as one might reasonably expect. What actually happened was this. I have here the translation of a decree which appeared in the official Servian organ of May 30th. The decree runs as follows :—

> "We, Peter, on the proposal of our Minister of War, having heard and taken cognisance of the decision of the Council of Ministers, do resolve that"

> "are, at their own request, and on the ground of Section 22 of the law on the Army, placed in a state of peace."

The Section 22 referred to in the decree is, I understand, a provision by which officers who have rendered distinguished service to their country are allowed to retire on pensions amounting to the full salary which they are at the time receiving. The decree proceeds to state that out of consideration for their good will, by which they have placed their positions at the disposal of the Government, their pensions shall amount to their full salary.

What has actually happened, therefore, is that five of the principal members of the regicide party, so far from having been retired in what I may venture to term a somewhat ignominious manner, are allowed to retain their present salaries as full pensions and to leave the Army without a stain on their characters. I am also informed that in order that there should be no unpleasantness the King has recently appointed two members of the regicide party to the position of aide-de-camp, in which capacity they no doubt would come occasionally in communication with our representative when he goes there.

Speaking for myself, I should like to see diplomatic relations reestablished with this country. We have no quarrel with the Servian nation, and it is, so far as I am aware, just as much entitled to our respect as any other nation; but I must say I do resent a state of things which appears to have brought about a resumption of diplomatic relations under somewhat unsatisfactory circumstances. If what I have stated is correct, and I have every reason to believe that it is, then I venture to think this country has not been overwell treated in this matter. I observe that an English Minister has been appointed, but has not yet been gazetted. I venture to ask whether it would not be well, before this gentleman actually proceeds to his post, to suggest to the Servian Government that it should show rather better evidence of goodwill in this affair than it has demonstrated up to the present time.

*THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Lord FITZMAURICE): My Lords, I think it is natural that my noble friend, who possesses great knowledge of the affairs of the East of Europe, should call attention to the facts connected with this incident. Undoubtedly the situation that has existed in Servia since the great crime committed in June, 1903, has been a very difficult one. It was the bounden duty of the Government of this country to mark its sense of the terrible character of the events which took place in the Palace of Belgrade. We had strict precedent for our action in suspending diplomatic relations with Servia. Personally I was mixed up many years ago in the complicated negotiations which ended the suspension of relations between this country and Mexico consequent on the death of the Emperor Maximilian, when nearly all the Great European Powers suspended relations with Mexico for a longer or a shorter time, and we were almost the last, if not the last, to renew relations. Therefore, had the Government chosen in the case of Servia, which was an infinitely graver matter than that of Mexico, we would not have been without argument to show that we could take up a still stronger attitude.

On the other hand, we have to bear in mind that if the duty of a country like ours is to make a clear assertion of the dignity of the public right of Europe—if I may use the expression—it has also to bear in mind that the suspension of diplomatic relations with any country is always a matter which bears rather hardly on our own "nationals." We ought always to be careful that, while punishing other countries, we may not possibly be inflicting considerable injury on our own subjects. As to Mexico, for example, it was forcibly borne in upon my mind, especially through communications in the House of Commons, where I at that time sat, how very serious a condition of things the suspension of diplomatic relations was for British subjects in Mexico.

The Secretary of State thought it was his first duty in the case of Servia to see that there should be some clear acknowledgment on the part of the Servian Government by some public act that the crime of June, 1903, was not to be passed over without notice. It is impossible on the other hand in a matter of this kind for a foreign Government like ours to interfere in details; but the broad fact is that, out of deference to the sole and unsupported action of this country, the Servian officers have been removed from the active list, and an assurance has been given that they will not be employed again. I believe it will be felt that by our action this country has sufficiently vindicated what we consider to be the public law affecting the case. One point has weighed with His Majesty's Government. Servia is in a very unsatisfactory condition, and the presence of a British Minister may in itself be the means of helping towards the restoration of a more satisfactory condition of affairs. The people of Servia may thus be reminded by the presence of our Minister that there is a country in Europe where liberty and order can exist together, and perhaps in time they may be able to realise and to follow our example.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I am sure your Lordships will have heard with satisfaction the statement which has just been made by the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. I do not think that any of your Lordships could have been in any doubt as to the opinion of the Government, or of any British Government, in respect to the odious crime which was committed a few years ago in Servia. But it is a matter of satisfaction that, not only in the House of Commons, but here, there should be a formal pronouncement by the Foreign Office to the effect that the present advisers of the Crown are entirely in accord with the policy which we pursued in this matter when we held their places.

It was impossible for a British Government to continue in a relationship of courtesy with a Government which had been guilty of so heinous a crime, for if we had done so it would have appeared to Servia and to the world that Great Britain condoned the crime. Accordingly we took the only step which was open to us to take. My noble friend behind me who raised the question has complained that the Servian Government have not made full reparation, that they have been not a little grudging in acknowledging the heinousness of the error they committed, and that His Majesty's present Government have been too kind in overlooking their fault. I agree with my noble friend that the behaviour of the Servian Government from the beginning to the end of this unhappy business has been in the highest degree deplorable and shocking, and it is only of a piece with their previous conduct that their reparation should have been of so hesitating and grudging a character.

I also think that my noble friend opposite, the Under-Secretary, was justified in saying that we have not only Servian interests to consider in this matter but British interests as well, and it is of the highest importance, from a British point of view, that the ordinary means of diplomatic intercourse should be resumed as soon as reasonably may be. I gather from my noble friend behind me that he entirely concurs in that view. With regard to the reparation, that is not a matter with which we need concern ourselves very greatly. There remains upon record the fact that in consequence of the action of the British Government, and that action alone, public justice in Europe has been vindicated, and the Servian Government have been compelled by our action publicly to admit that a great crime was committed, and that those who were principally responsible for that crime are no longer worthy of the confidence of their country and of the King who reigns over it. That is a great achievement upon which the Government of this country are to be congratulated.

LORD NEWTON: My Lords, I only rise for the purpose of saying that, if this question is a very difficult one, it has clearly been solved very much to the advantage of the Servian Government; and if any people have a special right to be satisfied with the arrangement arrived at it is the regicide officers themselves, who are no worse off for what has happened, but, if anything, are in a better position.

House adjourned at twenty minutes past Six o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

Grants to Universities — Terms of Reference to Permanent Treasury Committee.

DR. COOPER (Southwark, Bermondsey): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will state what were the terms of reference to the permanent committee of five, appointed by the Treasury last March, in connection with the distribution of £100,000 per annum among the institutions of university rank.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) The Committee referred to was appointed to advise the Treasury as to the distribution of the grant in aid of colleges furnishing education of a university standard, and it will be their duty to make such inquiries into the work done by the colleges and their financial resources as may be necessary to enable them to discharge this advisory function. The principles of distribution are laid down in the Treasury Minute of July 18th, 1905 [Cd. 2621].

Charge on Poor Rates of Disabled Sailors and Marines — Suggested refund by the Admiralty.

MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will move the Admiralty to take upon itself charges incurred by boards of guardians on account of sailors and marines who have been disabled in His Majesty's service.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I have received representations on this subject from boards of guardians, and I have communicated with the Admiralty with regard to them. The Admiralty state that the Regulations governing the award of naval pensions provide for the grant of a pension varying from 6d. to 2s. a day, with additional allowance in respect of time served as petty officer and of good conduct badges, &c., in every case in which a man's permanent incapacity can be regarded as directly attributable to the service. The Admiralty also state that men who are invalided from ordinary causes not attributable to though contracted in the service, are awarded pensions for life, or for a limited period, according to the length, nature, and character of their service. The Admiralty further state that special pensions are also awarded in certain cases, from the charitable funds of Greenwich Hospital, to seamen and marines of good character who have been discharged from His Majesty's service, and are permanently or temporarily unable to maintain themselves; but under the Regulations governing the Charity payment cannot be made for any period during which the recipient is an inmate of a workhouse or asylum or is otherwise chargeable to the rates. I have issued a circular to boards of guardians, giving the effect of the reply of the Admiralty.

Pensions of Quartermaster with rank of Major.

MR. HICKS BEACH (Gloucestershire, Tewkesbury): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the fact that a Royal Warrant was issued in 1903 granting quartermasters the rank of major after 15 years' service, but owing, presumably, to an oversight, no corresponding increase was made in the amount of their pensions, he will take the necessary steps to provide them with pensions corresponding with the rank at which they retire; and, in the event of such provision being made, will the cases of those quartermasters who attained the rank of major subsequent to the Royal Warrant of 1903 and have already retired, be treated on equal terms with those who may become entitled to pensions in the future.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The retired pay of quartermasters is dependent upon length of service, not rank, and the step of honorary rank given in 1903 did not, and was not intended to, affect their retired pay.

COLONIAL MARRIAGES BILL [LORDS].

Read the first time; to be read a second time upon Wednesday next, and to be printed. [Bill 267].

LAND TENURE BILL.

As Amended by the Standing Committee, considered.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) said his object in moving the new clause of which he had given notice was to safeguard arrangements which he believed to be for the mutual convenience both of landlords and of tenants. It was a matter of general knowledge that at the commencement of any tenancy arrangements were made between landlord and tenant as to the ordinary repairs of the premises, etc., and if by reason of the passing of this Act these existing arrangements were upset it must work to the inconvenience of both parties and to the advantage of no one. It would be wise, therefore, to make provision that existing arrangements should stand good. The clause referred only to ordinary repairs. The arrangements varied in different parts of the country, and hence the necessity for this clause.

LORD WILLOUGHBY DE ERESBY (Lincolnshire, Horncastle), in seconding the clause, insisted on the importance of including some such provision in the Bill. There were certain places in England and Scotland where the terms of the agreements as regarded the letting of lands varied very greatly, and when he raised this question upstairs several hon. Members objected to any alteration with regard to the question of repairs, as it was not the custom in their parts of the country for the tenant to contract himself to do any repairs. His own experience, however, was very different, for he well knew that before a tenant signed an agreement or lease he covenanted to do certain repairs. It was most essential that the small repairs referred to in this proposed clause should be done by the tenant, as nothing was more necessary to the proper cultivation of a farm than that the ditches should be adequately dug out and that the outfalls of drains should be properly cleaned. He had known thousands of pounds expended on the drainage of the land rendered absolutely useless owing to the fact that the tenant had not cleaned out the outfalls of the drains. In most of the agreements with which he had had to deal the tenant had undertaken the responsibility for these repairs, and in his opinion, unless they put into the Bill some such explanatory clause as that now proposed, when the measure came to be put in force enormous difficulties would arise in connection with the interpretation of Clause 7. All those matters, the repairs of roads bridges, etc., he maintained, if the tenant had covenanted to do them, he should be bound to do them. They were not to form the subject of compensation. If they formed the subject of compensation it would mean the alteration of every tenancy and lease which at present existed where the tenant had bound himself to do these small repairs. Under these circumstances there should be some such clause as had been proposed by the right hon. Member for the Newport Division of Shropshire.

New clause—

"Nothing in this Act shall affect existing arrangements between landlord and tenant as to ordinary repairs to premises, gates, fences, drains, or ditches, whether established by agreement or by the custom of the country."—(Colonel Kenyon-Slaney.)

Brought up and read the first time.

Colonel Kenyon-Slaney.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the clause be read a second time."

MR. SOARES (Devonshire, Barnstaple) said as they were anxious to meet hon. Gentlemen opposite so far as possible they would accept this clause.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause added to the Bill.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith Burghs) said he hoped the hon. Member would also accept the new clause he now desired to move. It had the support of the Scottish Chamber of Agriculture, which represented all the agricultural societies of Scotland. The clause was substantially the same as that moved by the hon. Member for Kincardineshire in Committee, and the reason for its incorporation in the Bill would be much stronger in the future than it had been in the past, because under Clause 5 of this Bill a new form of compensation—compensation for disturbance—was given which might fall upon the incoming tenant. It was in the interest of agriculture that the incoming tenant should have his capital free for investment in the profitable cultivation of the farm, and if the burden of the incoming tenant was piled up by his having to pay not only the old forms of compensation which already existed but also the new forms of compensation provided under the Bill, including compensation for disturbance to the out-going tenant, it would be a burden he would be unable to bear. The owner, who was the man upon the land, was the person to settle with the outgoing tenant. The cost of arbitration would also be greatly increased under the Bill, especially by Clause 5, and those costs would also be put on the incoming tenant, who would be thus deprived of much capital which ought to be employed on the cultivation of the land. He begged to move.

*MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.) seconded the clause on behalf of the agriculturalists of the midland counties of England. Many of his strongest agricultural supporters had again and again represented to him the loss sustained by the incoming tenant in this way: "He paid for the improvements in the rent, which was charged at the full current value, and also had to pay once for the improvements on paying the compensation of the outgoing tenant." The principle was one that ought to be embodied in the Bill.

New Clause—

"It shall not be lawful for a landlord to bind an incoming tenant to settle the claim of the outgoing tenant for compensation for improvements?—(Mr. Munro Ferguson.)

Brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the clause be read a second time."

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) said he quite understood the point of the hon. Member who moved this Amendment, and his desire to see the incoming tenants' capital preserved intact for the purposes of husbandry. But the hon. Member seemed to have forgotten that the incoming tenant was a free agent; that he was not obliged to come in unless he liked. Under this Bill they were simply piling up the compensation to be paid by the landlord. However much they disliked the landlord, he thought it was very hard that he should not be allowed to make such arrangements as that described by the hon. Member. Under this Bill they wished to mulct him in the cost of compensation for disturbance and every sort of compensation it was possible to conceive. He did not see that the good done to husbandry would be so great as was suggested by the hon. Member, because the tenant was just as well able to protect himself as was the landlord. He opposed the clause.

*LORD HELMSLEY (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk) said the proposed clause would go a long way to prove the truth of the contention that they were going too far in the direction of giving compensation for improvements to the outgoing tenant. The wording of the Amendment showed that those who supported it thought so themselves, because, instead of going the right way to work to stop the burden on the incoming tenant, they transferred the burden, which they admitted was an unfair one, from the incoming tenant to the landlord. The most natural, cheapest, and simplest arrangement was one whereby the incoming tenant arranged to take over the unexhausted improvements from the outgoing tenant. If they substituted this clause for the existing conditions—under which it was optional for an arrangement to be made directly between the outgoing and incoming tenants—there would be a much more expensive deal to arrange in handing over a farm from one tenant to another. In the first place, instead of having a simple arbitration between the outgoing tenant and the incoming tenant, with the landlord standing apart altogether, they would have an arbitration as between the outgoing tenant and the landlord and secondly between the incoming tenant and the landlord. The two arbitrations meant double the cost and probably would be less satisfactory in the end. Why, when an arrangement had to be made for the benefit of the incoming tenant, should he not be allowed to make the best arrangement he could with the outgoing tenant? By this clause they would be adding to the burden of the outgoing tenant and the incoming tenant and the landlord and would do no good to anybody.

*CAPTAIN BALFOUR (Middlesex, Hornsey) said that from the Scottish point of view there were many provisions in this Bill with which they, as landlords, might agree, and with others disagree. There were two kinds of improvements, one of a less and one of a more permanent character which might be a benefit to the landlord by enabling him to secure a better rent for the farm when the time for letting came. When a tenant left his farm the ordinary rule was that the incoming tenant took over the manure left by the outgoing tenant. Did the hon. Member wish to prevent the incoming tenant making a bargain with the outgoing tenant with regard to the manure? If he did many leases in Scotland would be affected thereby. Then in the greater part of Scotland the incoming tenant took over the way going crop; he bought it from the outgoing tenant—a very fair arrangement. If the hon. Member excluded the taking over of the manure which the former tenant left on the farm and the taking over of the way going crop this clause was of a very far-reaching character. If he did not exclude those matters then he thought the clause was a wise one. He would like to have some clearing up of these points before proceeding further.

MR. SOARES agreed with what had been said in favour of the clause, but said there was the fact to be considered that they could not have everything in one Bill. He wished they could include a great deal more in the Bill, but time was limited, and they could not have everything they desired. Having regard to that fact, he would appeal to his hon. friend to withdraw the clause and allow the discussion on the Bill to proceed.

*MR. MUNRO FERGUSON, in deference to the wishes of his hon. friend, asked leave to withdraw the clause.

*MR. SPEAKER: Is it your pleasure that the clause be withdrawn? [OPPOSITION cries of "No."]

SIR F. BANBURY (City of London) said he wanted to make a few observations on the clause. The Bill was not one to promote and encourage agriculture, but it was a Bill to take something away from the landlords. He was glad to think that every hon. Member opposite did not hold that view.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not entitled to review the whole Bill.

SIR F. BANBURY said the speech of the hon. Gentleman in introducing the Amendment showed that the best thing he could have done was to have opposed the Second Reading of the Bill.

MR. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.) said he rose to make an appeal. His hon. friends behind him did not quite realise the situation when the hon. Gentleman for Leith Burghs asked leave to withdraw the clause. The hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill suggested with great wisdom and perfect fairness to all concerned that the clause should be withdrawn. That was the object obviously that his hon. friends behind him had in view, and he would ask them to agree to the request to allow the withdrawal of the clause.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HICKS BEACH (Gloucestershire, Tewkesbury) moved a new clause to provide that the Act should come into operation on January 1st, 1908. If the Bill passed in its present form the whole system of land tenure would undergo a complete change, and it was only fair that landlords should have time to review their position, and consider what steps they should take to secure their rights before the Bill came into force. Under the Bill as it stood the landlords would find that they had practically lost complete control over their own property. No arbitrator would be able to say what was reasonable or unreasonable, and there would be endless disputes. Besides that, the landlord would find that his own property might have undergone a complete change without his being able to say anything at all about it, for under Clause 7 the tenant had only to say that he wished to lay down part of his farm to permanent pasture, another part to orchard—100 acres to strawberries and 100 acres to asparagus, and so on—and however much the landlord might object to his property being transformed in this way it would be impossible for him to take any steps to prevent it. Moreover, there were landlords who took a great interest in farming and kept very good stock, some of the best herds of cattle, flocks of sheep, and pigs being owned by landlords, who had given a great impetus to the breeding of stock. Under the Bill as it stood, however, it would be impossible for any landlord in the future to take any of his land in hand to farm it for himself unless he gave compensation to the sitting tenant. It was an absolute attack on the rights of property. Then there was the question of making further provision for allotments and small holdings throughout the country. He believed many hon. Gentlemen opposite were very favourable to the idea of further increasing the number of small holdings, and providing greater facilities for allotments. Would it be unreasonable for a landlord to give notice to his tenant because he wished to divide some of his property into small holdings? It was quite a new doctrine that landlords were to have no consideration at all. He was always led to believe that Members of this House, when they considered a measure, were impartial enough to hear both sides. It must be remembered, too, that land in this country was not held entirely by large land-owners, and any attack that was made upon their rights would also be made upon the small landowners who formed a very large class. He begged to move.

LORD TURNOUR (Sussex, Horsham) seconded; he thought it was absolutely necessary that both landlords and tenants should have at least eighteen months to consider their position under the Bill. He understood that the promoters of the Bill would accept the clause and therefore he would only formally second it.

New Clause—

"This Act shall come into operation on the first day of January, one thousand nine hundred and eight."—(Mr. Hicks-Beach.)

Brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed "That the clause be read a second time."

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY pointed out that customs differed in various parts of the country. In the part from which he came the holdings invariably dated from Lady Day to Lady Day, and even the extension suggested by his hon. friend would not give time for any such arrangements being made as would absolutely and inevitably be necessary in many cases if this Bill were passed. Supposing a tenant wished to give notice to a landlord or a landlord wished to give notice to a tenant, such notice could not be given until Lady Day next year, to take effect the following LadyDay, so that the earliest quittance would not be until Lady Day, 1908. Therefore he thought if the operation of the Bill was to be postponed so as to give time for the notice to take effect on either side it would really have to be after Lady Day, 1909, before there could be any practical advantage from the extension. His hon. friend had shown many good reasons why the extension should be made. A landlord face to face with this Bill would in many cases desire very largely to reduce the expenditure on his estate and would certainly dismiss many agricultural labourers, and some time should be given to these poor fellows to look about them. If the Bill came into operation there would be 100,000 men out of employment. Then, again, the landlord might be contemplating for some time improvements in various directions, but so as not to disturb an old tenant he put off the improvements until the tenant's death. What was he to do under this Bill? If he wanted to carry out any of his improvements he feared he would have to harden his heart, and give notice now instead of waiting until the farm in the natural course of things came into his hands. The result of the Bill was likely to be that such a holding would become empty. He strongly supported the new clause, but he wished to see it so far extended as to cover the natural condition of things. He did not know how the proposal would affect leaseholders in Scotland, but they would always meet with difficulties owing to the difference between tenure under leases and tenure under yearly agreements. From the point of view of yearly tenancies there was every reason why this extension should be made.

MR. SOARES said he was sorry that the promoters of the Bill could not accept the clause. It had been said that this Bill was an attack upon landlords, but it was nothing of the kind. The only landlords who would suffer under it were the bad landlords. When the promoters first introduced the Bill they hoped that it would come into operation immediately the Royal Assent was given to it. He wished to state that an Amendment would be moved in due course by the hon. Baronet who represented the Board of Agriculture, which would make the date January 1st, 1907, and that would be accepted.

MR. WALTER LONG hoped the hon. Member for Barnstaple would look at this question from a practical point of view. If the promoters had been content to confine the measure to amending the Agricultural Holdings Act he should have asked his hon. friend not to press his Amendment, but this was an omnibus Bill, which not only dealt with the Agricultural Holdings Act but also altered in a drastic fashion the law of tenure and the law relating to ground game. Under these circumstances was it reasonable to say that the Bill should come into operation within a few days of its passing? The hon. Memer must have made his own time table and he must have taken into account the time it would take to consider the Amendments on the Paper. As a matter of practical politics, it was impossible for this Bill to pass into law in its present form until the end of this year, and was it a reasonable proposition that a Bill should pass late in November or December and then immediately after publication expect its provisions to be known to the thousands of farmers and others who would be affected by it? He submitted that that was not a reasonable position for the hon. Member to take up. The Bill did a great many things which it was necessary that both farmers and landlords should have time to consider. He presumed that upon this question hon. Members opposite had the big landlords in their mind. He had never thought of the big landlords, because they could very well be left to take care of themselves; but there were thousands of small landlords who owned small holdings and they were just as much affected by this Bill as the big landlords. Did anybody imagine that all these small owners could make themselves acquainted with the provisions of the Bill in so short a time? Only that morning he had received a communication upon this very point which he had not had time fully to consider. He submitted to the hon. Member that he would lose nothing by putting in a date that would allow people sufficient time to make themselves acquainted with the Act, while by pressing the measure in its present form he would only be imperilling its passage into law.

MR. NUSSEY (Pontefract) thought that the Bill as a matter of draughtsmanship was so badly drafted that it would take a person of ordinary intelligence at least several months before he could understand what the Bill meant and what his hon. friend meant to achieve by it. The Bill had had the good fortune of the ballot, but it contained principles which deserved more attention than could be given to them upon a Friday afternoon. It dealt with the advisability of setting up the Irish system of dual ownership in this country. ["No."] That was a conclusion they would have to face, whether they liked it or not, and there was a clause in the Bill which did set up the principle of dual ownership. It also challenged the whole system of land tenure in this country. When such questions were dealt with in one Bill they required time and consideration before the measure was put into operation. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Dublin had pointed out that the Bill could not come into law and receive the Royal Assent until the end of this year, and he understood that the Government were going to propose an Amendment that the Act should come into operation on the 1st of January next year. There was much that was good and also much that was harmful in the Bill, and he hoped the Amendment would be accepted, in order that the various interests might have an opportunity of adjusting themselves to the new conditions.

*COLONEL WILLIAMS (Dorsetshire, W.) said he intended to support this Amendment, which was necessary under the terms of the Bill itself; for the Bill provided that where freedom of cropping was allowed the conditions should not apply in the last year of the tenancy. There were a great many landlords who had already given their tenants entire freedom of contract, and some of the tenancies would not have a whole twelve months to restore the farms unless the further date was given. Under the terms of the Bill itself they must give more than a whole agricultural year before the measure came into operation.

*Sir J. DICKSON-POYNDER (Wiltshire, Chippenham) thought there was a great deal of force in the argument advanced by his right hon. friend the Member for South Dublin. His speech was not the least in the way of obstruction, but in a practical direction. The Bill would take some time to pass through this House and another place, and consequently there would only be a very short interval between the passing and the commencement of the Act. He thought the acceptance of the Amendment would greatly facilitate the passage of the Bill. He did not agree with the apprehensions which had been expressed in connection with this measure, because he believed that there was much good in it, although there were some matters susceptible of amendment. When one realised how slowly the practical working of a Bill of this kind operated in country districts he thought it was of the greatest possible importance that due notice should be given to both landlords and tenants and to all concerned, in order that they might be made fully conversant with its provisions before it came into operation. The proposal was reasonable, and he urged his hon. friend to accept it.

Mr. CAVE (Surrey, Kingston) said he agreed with the hon. Member for Pontefract that it would take a great many months to understand the Bill. He had done his best to understand it in the time at his disposal, but he confessed he had not been able to make head or tail of a good many of its provisions. If passed in its present form there would be such a crop of litigation as would absolutely surprise the promoters of the Bill.

Mr. SOARES (interrupting) said he was prepared to accept the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

Lord WILLOUGHBY de ERESBY moved to amend the new clause by substituting April 7th for January 1st. In most districts in England the landlord and tenant would not have sufficient time to make the new arrangements in connection with agreements which might be necessitated by the passing of the Bill if the date now in the clause were retained. He hoped the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill would see the reasonableness of this proposal. If changes had to be made in regard to future agreements it was only right that those concerned should have fair warning, and it would only be possible to give such warning if sufficient time were allowed.

*Mr. LANE-FOX (Yorkshire, W.R., Barkston Ash), in seconding the Amendment, associated himself with the noble Lord in the appeal for an extension of time in the interests of tenants who would wish to consider their new position, as well as in the interests of landlords in the North of England where tenancies dated up to Lady Day. It was obvious that the granting of the time asked for would be of extreme importance from the point of view of the Bill itself. All that was asked was that the Bill should be made practical. He supposed that the hon. Gentleman wished to make it practical and useful, and he appealed to him in the interest of both landlords and tenants to make the proposed alteration in the date.

Amendment proposed to the proposed clause—

"To leave out the words 'first day of January,' and insert the words 'seventh day o April'—(Lord Willoughby de Eresby)—instead thereof."

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

Mr. SOARES said he had made a concession of a rather important nature, but if hon. Members opposite were going to use any concession which might be made as a step towards further concessions he certainly would not be inclined to make any. He had done his best to comply with the wishes of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and he did not think he should be asked to accept this Amendment.

Mr. WALTER LONG admitted that the hon. Gentleman had done his best to meet the objections to the Bill. Reference had been made to difficulty in connection with the legal interpretation to be placed on the clauses. He was no lawyer, but he had taken the trouble to obtain the opinion of lawyers, and he was certain that if the measure passed through the House in anything like its present form, subject only to those Amendments which were on the paper and seemed likely to be carried, it would go quite as far as his hon. friend behind him had stated, and in some cases further. Although the Bill dealt drastically with agricultural holdings, ripped up the law with regard to land tenure, and amended a number of Acts of Parliament, the Committee upstairs had not the advantage for five minutes of the presence of an English law officer of the Crown. Demands were made by his hon. friend and by hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House for a definite expression of opinion by a responsible law officer of the Crown as to the effect of the clauses. The only law officer present was the Solicitor-General for Scotland, who rendered most valuable service to the Committee, for which he tendered to the hon. and learned Gentleman his warmest thanks. But the hon. and learned Gentleman said he would not express definite opinions on questions of English law and practice. That was the position in which the Committee found themselves. If this Bill passed in its present form it would lead to an enormous amount of friction and difficulty, and there would be considerable labour in interpreting the real meaning of the clauses. He thought the date proposed in the Amendment was better fitted to meet the requirements of the case than that mentioned in the clause. This was not a foolish proposal. The Amendment was one of substance, and therefore he could not ask his hon. friend to withdraw it. If the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill accepted the Amendment no one would be injured in any way. He did not regard the 1st of January as an effective date, but the 7th of April was.

*Mr. LEIF JONES (Westmoreland, Appleby) hoped that those who were in charge of the Bill would think very carefully before accepting the Amendment. It was moved on the plea that landlords and tenants should have time to rearrange their tenancies. He noticed that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Dublin in his support of a later date merely asked for time to consider and understand the Act, and made no mention of any desire that land lords might be enabled to give notice to their tenants. That was rather a remarkable omission.

Mr. WALTER LONG: The hon. Gentleman should not make suggestions of that kind. I dealt with some of the most important reasons for this proposal, and I said frankly that when I was speaking I had not realised that the original date would not cover this particular case.

*Mr. LEIF JONES replied that that was exactly what he said. He suggested that there should not be an exception made in favour of Michaelmas tenancies, as was made in the clause as it now stood. On the other hand, the 7th April was not much use to them in Cumberland and Westmoreland where the tenancies changed frequently on the 1st or 12th of May.

Colonel LOCKWOOD expressed the hope that the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill would accept the Amendment. The hon. Member must not be surprised if small landowners like himself and some of his hon. friends who felt they were going to be attacked by the Bill, should be determined to obtain every possible advantage they could by way of Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Dublin had said that it was the small landlords who were going to be principally attacked by the Bill. He would take every means in his power to have every clause thoroughly discussed. Was it surprising that the small landlords, a class in which he included himself, should feel the greatest anxiety about a Bill which, as the hon. Member for Pontefract had said, would practically establish fixity of tenure, fair rents, and dual ownership, and desire that its operations should be delayed as long as possible? For himself, he wanted to have time to think it over, to make such pecuniary arrangements as were left possible for him, and to come to some terms with his tenants. He frankly admitted that with these ideas in his mind it was but natural that he should look for every means for escape. He thought that they had every right to ask the hon. Gentleman to accept the small addition of time proposed by his hon. friend.

*MR. CAWLEY (Lancashire, Prestwich) said that most of the tenants in this country terminated their tenancies on Lady Day. The Bill was of an extremely important character. Nobody could deny that it interfered with vested interests, and created new interests. He thought that a Bill that created new interests in land, which took something from the landlords and gave it to the tenants, was not a Bill which would do much good to the general community. They were all in favour of a scheme which would employ more people on the land. This Bill would not put one more man on the land, nor even lead to the employment of an additional agricultural labourer. It certainly would be of some benefit to the tenant farmers, because it would give them a vested interest in property which they did not at present own. He was in favour of many parts of the Bill, but, as he did not wish to see it rushed through the House without sufficient consideration, he hoped the Amendment would be accepted.

MR. J. F. MASON (Windsor) said it could not for one moment be contended that landlords could be expected to continue to give the same conditions to the tenants under this Bill as they gave now. It could not be expected that landlords were going to accept the responsibilities and liabilities that would be cast upon them, without increasing their rents and making new conditions with their tenants. In many cases the landlords would farm the land themselves, or else throw it out of cultivation altogether. He knew of a case in his own county, where a tenant farmer had bought two small farms, of 200 acres in all. That represented the whole savings of that man's lifetime. What was the position in which this Bill would place that man? It would make it possible for the tenant of one of his farms to bring him into the bankruptcy court, and probably the only man who would be able to buy the land would be a neighbouring big landlord. The prolongation of time asked for by the Amendment was necessary in order to enable the small landlords to safeguard their own interests, and he believed it would also be beneficial to the tenants as well.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON thought the arguments to which they had just listened ought to have been addressed when Clause 5 was under discussion. At the same time he thought that the request for time to understand the Bill was a reasonable one.

MR. ABEL SMITH (Hertfordshire Hertford) said there were good grounds why the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill should accept the Amendment. Whether owners or occupiers they ought to have time for the consideration of their position. The only object of his hon. friend in moving his Amendment was that the concession proposed to be made in the Bill would make it fair all round, that tenancies which came to an end at Michaelmas and Lady Day should be placed on exactly the same footing. Something had been said in regard to the legal considerations in relation to this Bill. That recalled to his mind the fact that when the Bill was under review in the Grand Committee they had not the services of an English law officer. He recognised the good service rendered to the Committee by the hon. and learned Solicitor-General for Scotland. However, the hon. and learned Gentleman very candidly acknowledged that he was not capable, and could not be expected to give advice to the Committee on subjects of English law. He strongly protested against the absence of the law officers of the Crown during the discussion of a Bill which raised many difficult legal points. What he wanted to know was, whether tenancies in regard to which notices had been given before this Bill came into operation, but which would expire after the date at which it came into operation, came within its provisions. ["Yes."] That was a most important point, and although he was obliged to his hon. friends for their advice he thought this question ought to be decided upon the authority of the Government and of the law officers of the Crown. Numerous cases might arise in which either the landlord or tenant might give notice to quit or to determine the Lady Day tenancy. That day was, as had already been pointed out, the 25th of March, 1907, and the notice would not expire till the corresponding day in 1908, and he thought they were entitled to know whether in a case like that the complicated provisions of this Bill would apply.

SIR EDWARD STRACHEY (Somersetshire, S.) said there seemed to be a general agreement that something ought to be done in regard to the date at which this Bill should come into operation, and his hon. friend who was in charge of the Bill agreed that there must be an extension of time. That proposal had not met with entire approval, and it was suggested that there should be a later date. He thought it would be better to put an end to this discussion, and defer the debate on this matter until they came to Clause 11, upon which he had an Amendment to the effect that the Bill should not come into operation until the 1st of January, 1907. Hon. Gentlemen opposite seemed to take a pessimistic view of the Bill as it affected landlord and tenant, and therefore it would be much better if they postponed the discussion of the date at which it should come into operation till the time when the provisions of it had been settled, and when they knew what alteration it made in the law.

MR. LAMBTON (Durham, S.E.) argued that it was only reasonable that the time before which the Bill came into operation should be prolonged so that landlords might give notice to their tenants in regard to their intentions as to the continuance of the tenancy. In his view this was an utterly impossible and unreasonable Bill. If contracts were upset by the Bill, surely it was entirely right and just that the parties should have an opportunity of making other arrangements than those which now existed. All the benefits of the Bill would be given to the incoming tenant and not to the outgoing tenant; for his part he thought the landlord stood in loco parentis to all his tenants but especially to the outgoing tenant. All existing arrangements were upset by the Bill, which was loosely drawn and impossible of application. It was most desirable therefore that this discussion as to the postponement of the date upon which the Bill should come into operation should not be concluded until they had received some assurance which was in accordance with common sense.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY (Kent, Ashford) inquired whether, if this new clause were withdrawn, it would be in order to bring forward subsequently a proposal to the same effect.

*MR. SPEAKER said that if the new clause proposing that the Bill should come into operation on the 1st of January, 1908, was negatived then the same date could not at a later period be inserted in the Bill, because the House would have pronounced its opinion upon it and would have negatived that date. If the clause were withdrawn the question of the date could be raised again at a later period of the Bill.

MR. WALTER LONG said he was under the impression that the clause had been read a second time and that they were proceeding to amend it.

*MR. SPEAKER said he still had to put the question to the House that the clause should be added to the Bill, and if that were negatived then it would be possible to raise the same question but not the same date again.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY: And another date can be raised by Amendment?

*MR. SPEAKER: Yes; any other day can be proposed.

MR. PIKE PEASE (Darlington) expressed himself in favour of the landlords of the country being given an opportunity to give notice to their tenants before the Bill came into operation. As a matter of fact a considerable number of landlords had given notice to their tenants in consequence of the introduction of the Bill, and it seemed to him that others should have the opportunity of doing so. [MINISTERIAL Laughter.] Hon. Members might laugh, but he could prove that that was a reasonable contention. Under the Bill dual ownership would be introduced, and, as had been stated, two vested interests created. If that was going to be the case was it not reasonable that the landlord should have an opportunity of giving notice to his tenant before the Bill came into operation?

*MR. CAVE (Surrey, Kingston) wished to make a practical suggestion. It seemed to him fair to say that, when Parliament was imposing terms which were not in operation when the rent and other terms of tenancy were settled, each party should have an opportunity of considering whether he desired the tenancy to continue on those new terms. Therefore, instead of trying to fix a date, why should they not make a provision that the Bill should not apply to any existing tenancy till the earliest date at which it might have been determined by a notice given after the passing of the Act?

MR. GUEST (Cardiff District) said he was just about to make the same suggestion as the last speaker. It seemed to him to be most unfair that one landlord should be able to determine his tenancies before January 1st, 1908. and others should not have the same opportunity of doing so. He thought that all parties should have an opportunity of regulating their position before the Bill came into operation.

*MR. COURTHOPE (Sussex, Rye) hoped the suggestion made by the hon. Gentleman who represented the Board of Agriculture to postpone this Question until they got to Clause 11 would not be accepted. If the promoters of the Bill wished to get it through they would do well not to accept it themselves, because, so far as he was personally concerned, the opposition to many clauses of the Bill depended largely upon the time when it came into operation. The hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill had charged them with using one concession — and he admitted it was a great concession —in order to ask for another. But before the hon. Gentleman made that concession a proposal to change the date on which the Bill should come into operation was made by the hon. Member for Pontefract, and he gathered that that proposal would have covered Candlemas entries. He desired to add his voice to what other speakers had insisted on, namely, the importance of treating all landlords alike. It was perfectly ridiculous to say that only sufficient time should be given to enable the agricultural community to understand the Bill. There was every reason why landlords should have time to reconsider their arrangements with their tenants, and, if necessary—as in some cases it would be—to terminate them altogether. The case of the very small landlord had been mentioned. A man who owned two farms might live on one and let the other. It would be impossible for him to risk the huge outlay of capital which he might be called to find if the Bill were passed. He would—as had been suggested—have to go straight into bankruptcy or get rid of his tenants. It would only be fair and common justice that he should have an opportunity of terminating the tenancy. He did not think that the tenant farmer was going to get the slightest advantage from the Bill. If he were allowed to have this vested interest of course he would get an advantage, but rather than risk the disadvantage of this vested interest the landowner would get rid of the tenant altogether, and that would be disastrous to the whole agricultural community. There were many estates where the sporting rights were of far more monetary value to the landowner than the agricultural rent. Did they think the landowner was going to risk the loss of sporting rights of such value by keeping agricultural tenants under a Bill of this kind? Of course not. He would get rid of them, and it would be a great disaster to all concerned. Then there was the question of the great variety of custom with regard to covenants in leases and agreements in different parts of the country. In the part he came from, there was a material difference in the rents of farms according to the distance from the main road, for the simple reason that a tenant farmer covenanted under present arrangements to repair the roads.

*MR. SPEAKER: That question has nothing to do with the alteration of the date.

*MR. COURTHOPE (continuing) said that the argument in favour of January 1, 1908, advanced by the promoters was that there was no reason for giving time to landlords to review their tenancies. He was trying to show cause why in cases of tenancies which expired on Lady Day time should be given. He could not enlarge on the subject, but it was an important point. Under the Bill the tenant would get compensation from the landlord for many repairs which he now did at his own cost. That was a reason for allowing time for the reconsideration of the arrangements between landlord and tenant. He held a lease in his hand in which there were covenants as to repairs which would be upset by this Bill. That also was a reason for giving time—not to some—but to all landlords to re-arrange their tenancies before the Act came into operation. He hoped the promoters of the Bill would see their way to accept either the Amendment now before the House or some other Amendments which had been suggested, and would have a similar effect. If they did not, personally he would have to take up an attitude of uncompromising hostility to the Bill. [Laughter.] He did not see what there was for hon. Members to laugh at, because the chance of passing the Bill depended a great deal on the attitude he and his friends might take up in regard to it.

*SIR HENRY AUBREY FLETCHER (Sussex, Lewes) said he wished to join in the appeal which had been made by his hon. friend for an opinion from the law officers of the Crown. Although the law officers for England were not present he saw before him the Solicitor-General for Scotland and the Attorney-General for Ireland, one or the other of whom might be able to help landowners in their difficulties. At present they were in a rather perplexed state as to how they might be affected if this Bill became law, and therefore he made this appeal. He would also put before the House the difficulties landed proprietors who owned property in various counties were in. He would take only England; the Bill had nothing to do with Scotland. The tenancies in England varied greatly, and what had been said did not help them out of their difficulty. In the county of Sussex all his tenants on a large property had two years agreements. How would they be affected, and how would he be affected as landlord, in regard to those agreements so far as the date of this Bill was concerned: would the last agreements hold good, although they might not expire until after the Bill had come into force? What, again, as to other counties, where the dates were different, some Lady Day, and some Michaelmas, etc.? There was Cumberland, for instance, and the adjoining county of Westmoreland, alluded to by the hon. Member for Appleby, where the dates differed again. He thought, therefore, the House was justified, and they on that side especially, in pressing on one of the law officers the desirability of saying how they stood.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. URE, Linlithgowshire) said it was impossible for him to give a categorical reply to the plaintive appeal which had been made—and very properly made—for advice, but generally speaking, he thought he might say that if a notice was given to terminate a tenancy before the Bill came into force, but the notice took effect after the Bill came into force, he thought the Bill would take effect in so far as it amended the existing law. In other words so far as the Bill effected a change in the existing law it would apply to present agreements, but so far as it made a change in the law of landlord and tenant it would not apply.

Mr. SOARES rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Lord Willoughby de Eresby and Viscount Helmsley.

*MR. CAVE said he now moved the Amendment to which he had previously alluded. The Bill proposed to import into existing agreements conditions entirely new, which no one conceived would be imported into them when the tenancy was accepted, the rent fixed, and the terms of the tenancy agreed to. The effect of his Amendment would be to give a chance to the parties to those agreements to consider whether they would continue under the new conditions. The effect of the Bill was to throw upon the landlord the possibility of very heavy charges for new buildings to the erection of which he did not consent; for new drainage, wells, water courses and so on, for all of which he might be called upon sooner or later to pay. The landlord might well say that he did not contemplate these charges being made when he let his land; that he could not afford to pay them and that he would rather not let the land at all. Again, an agreement of tenancy often contained clauses as to cropping the land and other matters, which were duly considered when the agreements were entered into. Parliament was going to say by this Bill that they were to be struck out. The same thing also occurred with regard to the question of game. The landlord might have accepted a lower rent on the ground that damage would be caused by game, and now the Bill proposed that he should be responsible for the damage but should continue to receive the same rent. Under all these circumstances it was only justice that the landlord should be allowed to say whether or not he would determine the tenancy before the Act came into operation. He begged to move.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY said he seconded the Amendment for which a very good precedent could be found in the Ground Game Act—a precedent which the hon. Member would do well to follow. In that Act a saving clause was inserted in almost the very words moved by his hon. friend. He suggested that it was only reasonable that the hon. Member should put a safeguard of this kind into the Bill and that he could not do better, if he refused the words of his hon. friend, than look up Clause 5 of the Ground Game Act.

Amendment proposed to the proposed clause—

"At the end to add the words 'Provided that it shall not apply to any existing tenancy until the day next after the earliest day on which such tenancy might have been determined by notice given after the passing of this Act.'"—(Mr. Cave.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. SOARES said he hoped he would not be considered discourteous if he said he declined to consider the merits of this Amendment—for this reason. He had already accepted the Amendment asked for by the right hon. Member who led the Opposition in this matter.

After that Amendment had been accepted it was discussed by the right hon. Gentleman's followers, and the discussion had been prolonged by the moving of further Amendments on the same point.

Colonel KENYON-SLANEY said he sympathised with the difficult position in which the hon. Member found himself. He was certain that when the hon. Member made the concession he made it frankly and in a friendly spirit. But the hon. Gentleman did not quite realise that the extension for which they now asked was not a frivolous, but a necessary augmentation in order to get into the Bill the meaning which the hon Member had in his mind when he made the concession.

Mr. SOARES said he made it with the object of enabling everybody to accept the Bill.

Colonel KENYON-SLANEY agreed that his hon. friend had made a bona fide concession to extend the time, but the augmentation they now asked for was to make real and effective that which they understood his hon. friend was willing to concede. It was well to remember, and it was a curious and significant fact, that on every occasion in the legislative history of this country when there had been an Act altering as this Bill did things which had stood for many years it was the almost invariable practice to insert a saving clause of this description to cover existing agreements. The object of the Amendment was not obstructive, and all he desired to point out was that such a clause had been inserted in all Bills of this character.

Mr. MITCHELL-THOMSON (Lanark, N. W.) said the hon. Member in charge of the Bill quite misunderstood their ground for the action they were taking up in asking for this concession. The previous Amendment was destined to give time to the landlords and the tenants to arrive at a proper understanding of the Bill, but the object of the Amendment now before the House was to give time to the landlords and the tenants to make new arrangements in regard to their tenure. The Bill made a very great change in the land tenure of the country, and he could not see why the hon. Gentleman could not accept the Amendment.

*Mr. GEORGE FABER (York) thought that both precedent and justice required that the Amendment should be accepted. The precedents were too many to cite and he felt confident that hon. Members opposite would see the justice of the Amendment. Unless it was accepted the effect would be that they would have read into many existing contracts a Bill which would introduce into land tenure innovations of a very alarming nature. All contracts and agreements made up to the present time were naturally made in ignorance of any legislation being passed of the kind now proposed. Was it reasonable to suppose that the landlord and tenant who had entered into arrangements agreeable to both of them should have read into those arrangements legislation of the character now proposed? The Bill would affect more injuriously the smaller landlords than the larger because, as had been said, and with a certain show of reason, the larger landlords could look after themselves, but the smaller landlords did not, unfortunately, fall into that category. Clause 4 was going to do away with the system of cropping altogether. That in itself was a revolution, and would be very injurious to landlords who depended largely upon the cropping system for the proper cultivation of the land. Clause 7 might be fatal to the small landlord, because it proposed that improvements of the most material and vital kind might be set afoot without the consent of the landlord ever having been obtained. Unless they wiped the slate clean and allowed landlords to enter upon fresh arrangements after having seen what was in the four corners of the Bill they would be doing an injustice to many landlords. No one, he was sure, wished to do that. If they were to have this legislation, let them have it with their eyes open and put no one in an unfair position. They would do their best to carry out the law of the land if the Bill became an Act of Parliament, but they should allow the opportunity of terminating existing arrangements before the Bill was brought into operation.

Mr. COCHRANE (Ayrshire, N.) said one part of the United Kingdom had been completely left out of view by the hon. Members who framed this Bill. Whether they had an adequate knowledge of agriculture carried on in the South of England, he had no means of judging; but the Bill certainly aimed a deadly blow at the Scottish system of agriculture. The system in Scotland was one of nineteen-year leases, for which period a rotation of crops suitable to the different districts was laid down. Under that system of rotation of crops the cultivation of the soil in Scotland and the produce would bear comparison with any part of the United Kingdom, not because they were favoured with a more suitable climate, but simply because more science had been followed and greater attention paid in the North than in the South. The Bill gave no consideration to the fact that in Scotland the leases were for nineteen years, and a lease might have been entered into quite recently. During the course of the proceedings in Committee the Solicitor-General for Scotland delivered himself of the saying that the more he looked at this Bill from the Scottish point of view the less he liked it. When the hon. and learned Gentleman gave expression to such a strong view as that they might be assured that the case of Scotland had not been adequately considered by the framers of the Bill. It seemed that under this Bill all sorts of covenants to a lease could be swept away. Anything more unjust and unreasonable it was impossible to bring before the House. It was very little likely to do any real good to the tenants; and what would be the position of the landlord who owned a property constantly falling in value?

Mr. BILLSON (Staffordshire, N.W.): Is this in order?

*__Mr. DEPUTY-SPEAKER__ ruled that the hon. Gentleman was in order.

Mr. COCHRANE said that except for his hon. friend who made a speech from the Scottish point of view he was the only Scottish Member who had had an opportunity of saying anything. All the time that he had been in the House he had never known such constant interruptions on the part of hon. Members. He maintained it was most necessary that in Scotland existing tenancies and arrangements which had been so satisfactory in the past should be excluded from the purview of the Bill. There was a precedent in the Bill introduced by the Secretary to the Board of Agriculture, and supported by the hon. and learned Solicitor-General for Scotland. He preferred to pin his faith to the carefully drawn measure promoted by the Department, and supported by the hon. and learned Gentleman, than to a measure proposed by a private Member who knew nothing of the conditions in Scotland.

Mr. CHANNING said the Party to which the hon. Member for North Ayrshire belonged passed in 1900 an Act dealing with agricultural holdings for Scotland as well as England, and they fixed that the Act should come into operation on January 1st, 1901, without making exceptions.

Sir E. CARSON (Dublin University) said the Act to which the hon. Gentleman referred did not break contracts. He desired to ask a question to which perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor-General for Scotland would give an answer. This Amendment was to give an opportunity of reconsidering the question of contracts entered into between landlord and tenant. Looking through the Bill he discovered one very curious result, namely, that they were going to apply to England a Scottish agricultural Act, and to Scotland an English agricultural Act. If the hon. and learned Gentlemen would look at the short title he would see that they were all made one Act, presumably, so far as this Bill went. It said—

> "This Act may be cited as the Agricultural Holdings and Ground Game Act, 1906, and may be cited with the Agricultural Holdings (England) Acts, 1883 to 1900, and the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Acts, 1883 to 1900."

What he desired to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman to consider was what effect it would have upon contracts.

Mr. URE said that in a case in which notice was given to terminate a tenancy it was plain that whilst some of the clauses in this Bill would apply, others would not apply. He would give a general answer which he thought would be satisfactory to the House. It was this: when this Bill passed it was the intention of the Government to embody most of these clauses in a Bill which had been introduced consolidating and amending the Agricultural Holdings Acts. That would follow a very convenient precedent set by the late Government in regard to another matter. Some very minor and secondary alterations would be made. The hon. Member for North Ayrshire was quite right in saying that this Bill as originally drafted was certainly not applicable in its terms to Scotland, and the remark of his to which attention had been called passed his lips at a very early stage of the proceedings in Grand Committee. A number of Amendments were subsequently introduced which modified the Bill for Scotland, so that the remark he made early in the proceedings could scarcely be considered as his final view of the matter.

Mr. WALTER LONG said the speech they had just listened to must surely have convinced the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill that the only common-sense course was to accept the Amendment. If ever a Motion for the adjournment of the debate was justified it would be justified on this occasion in order to draw attention to the extraordinary position in which they found themselves. They had just heard a statement from the Solicitor-General for Scotland that in his view the Bill as originally in the Committee would have produced hopeless confusion in Scotland. Under the hon. and learned Gentleman's guidance that result had been avoided. But in what position were they who represented other parts? He had always envied the greater advantages which Scotland enjoyed under many of our laws and customs. In the case of the present Bill Scottish interests had had the inestimable advantage throughout the proceedings of the assistance of the extremely able gentleman who had just spoken. From the beginning of the proceedings they had never been favoured upstairs or downstairs by the presence of either of the English law officers. The Bill made important proposals. It made direct changes and amendments in the law, and they were now debating an Amendment which would safeguard all interests and put all on the same footing; and surely every word that fell from the Solicitor-General for Scotland justified them in pressing the Amendment. The hon. Member in charge of the Bill had accepted the Amendment postponing the operation of the Act, and he (Mr. Long) was not alive for the moment to the real effect of the change. In the light of what had been said since it was perfectly clear that the date ought to be prolonged to cover existing contracts and put all men on the same footing. He believed if a vote could be taken of the House regardless of Party considerations that would be the decision at which they would arrive. If they proceeded on the lines existing in the clause it would give protection to those whose tenancies expired within the period, and would give no protection in cases where the tenancies expired afterwards. He did not know why the promoters should object to the Amendment; was it because they had made one concession they declined to make another? That might be good Party tactics, but it was not common-sense, and it was not the sort of conduct that was going to help them get their Bill through. They were wasting time in resisting an Amendment which was fair and just, and they were deliberately determined to do a gross injustice to a considerable section of the community.

Mr. Soares rose in his place and claimed to move, "That the question be now put."

Mr. SPEAKER said he thought the House was prepared to come to a decision. [Cries of "No," and Members rose on both sides to continue the debate.]

*MR. SPEAKER: Then the Question is "that the question be now put."

The House divided:—Ayes, 278; Noes, 77. (Division List No. 146.)

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Soares and Mr. Arthur Dewar.

Clause added to the Bill.

MR. LAMBTON moved an Amendment to the preamble of the Bill, which states that—

> "it is expedient, in the interest of good husbandry, that better security should be made for the capital and labour invested by tenants in the cultivation of the soil."

The Amendment was that the words "landlords and" should be inserted after "by." He said that an examination of the provisions of the Bill would show that it was necessary that a proposal of this sort should be introduced. After the speeches they had heard that day from the opposite side it was most necessary to have the House express an opinion, and landlords as well as tenants ought to have some security for their capital and labour. This was a very far-reaching Bill. It established dual ownership and other things, and none of the hon. Members opposite seemed to consider it necessary that the capital and labour expended by a landlord on his property for the purpose of agriculture should be safeguarded. If they looked through the provisions of the Bill they would see that it was absolutely necessary that his Amendment should be adopted, because there were many clauses under which the landlord would suffer considerable hardship. He would forfeit not only some of his interests, but the security he had now for his life, because under one of the clauses right was given to a tenant to kill hares and rabbits with firearms. The landlord and his guests would walk about, therefore, in fear of being struck by bullets. The fourth clause, dealing with the freedom of cropping and disposal of produce, raised a very large question. The mode of cultivation, cropping, or disposal of produce differed in every county, and he was told even in every estate; yet this Bill proposed to break every contract. They were told that landlords were to have time to discuss what the Bill meant, but they were not allowed time to alter their contracts. The dual ownership established by Clause 5 was a very large question, and there was not time to discuss it in one afternoon. This was a question of which notice certainly ought to be taken in the preamble of the Bill. The system of dual ownership, which was regarded with favour in some quarters, was not recognised as a desirable form of owning land in this country. The tenants at the present time enjoyed great advantages which, he thought, the owners did not enjoy. The promoters of the Bill seemed to look at the question from the point of view of securing the interests of the tenants; but the interests of the landlords were also deserving of consideration. Clause 7, for instance, provided that the consent of the landlord was not required for the laying down of permanent pasture, or for—

> "Repairing buildings, roads, bridges, watercourses, ponds, wells, or reservoirs, or of works' for the application of water-power, or for supply of water for agricultural or domestic purposes."

This far-reaching clause was one which he thought the promoters of the Bill could not have thoroughly considered. In most districts of England the landlords did the repairs themselves, and as to permanent pasture any landlord who was interested in the proper cultivation of his land should be consulted on the question. The provision as to "supply of water for agricultural or domestic purposes" might mean that a tenant could provide reservoirs and water-power which would enable him to provide the farmhouse with electric light. When the tenant left the farm the single arbitrator under the Bill would probably lay down that this was an improvement for which the landlord ought to pay compensation. It must also be recollected that the landlord had to pay compensation in cash. The compensation would be determined according to existing ideas of what a so-called improvement was worth, and it would be seen how inequitable this was when they considered the further provisions of the clause. It provided that the consent of the landlord should not be required, among other things, for the planting of orchards, fruit trees, strawberries, asparagus, and other vegetable crops. That would put the landlord in a perfectly impossible position. The value of land which was worth £5 an acre, when planted with strawberries or rhubarb, might fall in two or three years time to £3 or £2 10s.; but the tenant, when he went out, would be awarded, under this Bill, compensation on the basis of £5. Surely no man could call that justice. In the district of Biggleswade the market gardens produced onions which were worth £10 a ton a few years ago; but owing to foreign competition the labouring classes were now able to buy onions much cheaper. At any rate, what was worth £10 a ton a few years ago was now worth only £3, and the landlord might be called upon to pay to a tenant who had planted onions compensation at a rate which would represent their value at £10 a ton. The tenant in that way would profit in a double degree—he would profit from the fertility of the land while he remained in occupation, and he would on leaving get a profit from the landlord in the shape of compensation for improvements. The district of Leeds was not a very promising place for the growing of rhubarb, but a large amount of rhubarb was grown there and sold in the market at a large price. The method was——

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member must confine himself to the Amendment to the preamble. Many of his observations would have been pertinent to Clause 7, but I do not think that the hon. Gentleman is entitled to go into these matters now.

MR. LAMBTON said he was pointing out how necessary it was to preserve the interests of the landlords. It was obvious that in the interests of good husbandry the interests of the landlord must be considered as well as those of the tenant. Under this Bill the whole subject would become a mass of litigation, and he desired that the Bill should be so amended that it would be clearly understood by all parties in the land that the landlords' interests as well as the tenants' were to be preserved. He begged to move.

*LORD HELMSLEY, in seconding the Amendment, said it raised one of the most important questions which could arise in the discussion of the Bill. The point ultimately raised was as to which was the best system of land tenure—whether it should be a system in which the landlord and the tenant had each a distinct sphere of action, or whether it should be a system in which one individual only had a sphere of action in the land. The Bill recognised only the rights of the tenant, and the Amendment was necessary in order that the rights of the landlord, which the House surely would admit did exist, might be properly safeguarded. Under the existing system the tenant utilised the land at a certain rent, and he was able to get the use of more land, owing to the fact that the landlord's capital was sunk in the land, than he could if he were the occupying owner. A great many hon. Gentlemen opposite thought that occupying ownership was the only system which ought to prevail. If they were to say that the landlords' interests should be removed altogether it would be a position which one could understand, but it would not be a just form of legislation, and it was not the form of legislation which, as yet, they would expect any House of Commons to pass. The Bill went some way in that direction, for it did not recognise the rights of the landlords who had provided so much of the capital employed in connection with the land. There was no question as to whether a farmer would or would not be better if he owned his present holding. By employing a certain amount of capital the tenant farmer was able under the present system to get the use of so much land out of which he got his living. No one would dispute that the real thing that mattered to a farmer was the amount of land he was able to use; that was far more important to him than anything else. The more land he was in occupation of the more likely he was to make a profit out of it. Some interesting tables had been prepared showing that under the present system of tenure a man with a given amount of capital was able to obtain the use of a considerably larger area of land than he would be able to secure with the same capital under a system of occupying ownership. He dared say that hon. Members had seen the tables to which he referred, which showed pretty plainly that the tenant derived benefit from the capital which the landlord had in the holding. If it was admitted that the landlord's capital was of value to the tenant by enabling him to use more land than he otherwise could it must be admitted that this capital should be secured to the landlord and not confiscated. The Bill took away from the landlord part of his right in land. Instead of discouraging capital the object of legislation should be to encourage it and increase it so that there should be more for the tenants to have the use of.

"In preamble, page 1, line 3, after the word 'by,' to insert the words, 'landlords and.'"—(Mr. Lambton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. SOARES said that although he regretted the amount of time which had been occupied in discussing this Amendment, he must say that for some reasons he did not regret it had been moved. He sincerely trusted that tenant farmers who were watching the progress of this measure would observe the words of the preamble to which the Party opposite were taking exception. They were that—

> "It is expedient in the interest of good husbandry that better security should be made for the capital and labour invested by tenants in the cultivation of the soil."

LORD HELMSLEY indicated dissent.

MR. SOARES said it was to that proposition that objection had been taken and an Amendment moved. [Cries of "No" and "An addition."] The real parent of the Bill was the hon. Member for South Molton. Although he had now deserted the green fields for the blue water, let any hon. Member who wanted to know whether he had practical knowledge of tenant-farming go down into Devonshire and inquire. The preamble was passed unanimously by the Grand Committee upstairs. There was not a word said against it then. The Grand Committee was a very good one; they had no less than nine sittings, they had never to wait a minute for a quorum, and there were never less than forty-three Members present at any meeting.

Colonel KENYON-SLANEY reminded the hon. Member that he had proposed to amend the preamble from the beginning of the proceedings in Committee, and had only refrained from moving it to expedite progress. Therefore it was not quite accurate to say that they had consented to this part of the Bill being passed without any Amendment. Referring to the part taken by Mr. Agar-Robartes in Committee, he wished to say that although they did not agree with that Gentleman in politics, they on that side of the House could not but extend sympathy to him in the disappointment he had recently experienced, more especially as they understood the position to be the result of no misconduct of his own. His hon. friend who had last spoken and he were on common ground in their relation to the land. He was as proud of his Bohemian descent as no doubt the hon. Member for Barnstaple was of his Portuguese ancestry.

Mr. SPEAKER: I fail to see what is the relevance of this genealogical research.

Colonel KENYON-SLANEY said that his object was to show that it took a family some time before they became competent to advise the House on land tenure. It had taken his family 700 years; his hon. friend's not, he thought, so long; but his descendants would look back with pride to the help he gave on this occasion. He wanted to say seriously that this Bill touched some of the most vital problems of the day, especially all economic questions relating to the land. The preamble of the Bill was not, he thought, accurate, and it wanted correction as well as some of the clauses. The occupier's position in a case of land tenure was very important, but it was not the sole interest, and they could not in the interests of the community at large forget the interests of other classes. It was a fatal mistake to give exceptional privileges to one class at the expense of another; to take away the legitimate property of one class, and give it without consideration to another. The Amendment asserted the joint interest of landlord and tenant in the problems dealt with by the Bill. It had been estimated that between 1875 and the year 1902, owing to the depression in agriculture, the tenants had lost no less a sum than £253,000,000. That undoubtedly established a very good case for the full consideration by legislation of the position of the tenants. But it should also be remembered that in the same time, and as a result of the same causes, the owner had lost £1,054,000,000 worth of property. Surely that showed that they must be careful in helping one class that the other class was not sacrificed. It could not too often be repeated that there could be no hope for the agricultural industry unless it attracted capital, but he maintained that the return for an investment in land after deducting rates, tithes, insurance, etc., was small and precarious at the best. It was of the most intense importance to the occupants of land that the owners should be induced to live on their own soil; but his contention was that this Bill would tend very largely to restrict the enjoyment of those landlords who did so. There was a conviction in some quarters that the landlords drew the money from the soil and spent it elsewhere. That was a mistake; he would give an instance, for the accuracy of which he could personally vouch. During fourteen years the total rental received from a small estate in the country was £58,000. Rates, taxes, tithes, insurance, came to £10,000, leaving £48,000; but out of that £48,000 there had to be spent on improvements and repairs for increasing the accommodation of the tenants, for the better housing of the labourers, etc., £22,000. Further, there had been spent in wages to those who lived on the property £18,000, so that during the fourteen years, £50,000 of the rental had been returned to the soil. He could assure the Committee that the reason why the owners remained on the soil was because they had an intense love of their own homes; and they realised that the first duty of a man who lived in his own home was to consider the welfare of all members of the establishment and grant them guidance and assistance. He thought full reason had been given why the Amendment which would unite owners and occupiers and all connected with the soil should be accepted. It would show a sense of fair play.

MR. SOARES rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Soares and Mr. Winfrey.

*MR. SPEAKER said that in consequence of the decision of the House on the last Amendment, an Amendment standing in the name of Colonel Kenyon-Slaney was out of order. This Amendment ran—

> "Preamble, page 1, line 3, at end, to add the words 'but consistently with the rights of the owners thereof, and with the capital and labour invested by them in its cultivation and development, and with the interests of the rural labouring classes, and of the community generally in such investment fund.'"

The House had decided that better security should not be given for the capital invested by landlords, and therefore that decision covered the Amendment or at all events a portion of it.

MR. SOARES, on the point of order, asked whether the Amendment was not beyond the scope of the Bill.

*MR. SPEAKER thought that the interests of the agricultural labourer and the question in regard to investments in land came within the scope of the Bill. The House, however, had already dealt with a portion of the Amendment.

MR. SOARES said the Bill only dealt with the relations between landlords and tenants and tenants and landlords.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY wished to point out that the labourers formed a very considerable part of the arrangements between landowners and tenants, and to leave out the labourers was not part of the policy of hon. Members on that side of the House.

*MR. SPEAKER agreed that he could not say that the labourer was not a tenant. He thought he very often was a tenant.

MR. SOARES wished to know, if the labourer was a tenant, whether he was within the preamble of the Bill.

SIR E. CARSON said the words of the preamble dealt with the capital and labour invested. Therefore could it not be said that questions concerning labourers could be dealt with?

*MR. SPEAKER said that these additions to the preamble led to very little, and until one saw the Amendment or the clause which was proposed, one could not say whether it was in order or not. He could not say on the face of it that there might not be Amendments which might deal with this subject, which might come within the scope of the Bill.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY said he would endeavour to keep within the ruling of the Speaker and to make his observations as short as possible. He moved the insertion of the words "but consistently with the interests of the rural labouring classes and of the community generally in such investment." The interest of the rural labouring classes happened to be a point which he had spent some fifty years of his life in attempting to solve. Therefore if there was any man in the House who could speak with authority on the matter it was himself. Every single labourer on his estate held his cottage from him and was his tenant. He held it under conditions which saved him from capricious eviction or any capricious action whatever. Therefore he was very much interested in this question, and on his estate the occupation of the labourers of their cottages was a matter of first rate importance as to the conditions attaching to the tenancies. There were many people who seemed to think that if they settled the financial question between the owner and occupier they had settled the whole question concerning the rural community. That, however, was not so.

MR. SOARES said the promoters of the Bill were prepared to accept the Amendment provided the hon. and gallant Gentleman would finish his speech. He pointed out that the hon. and gallant Gentleman had himself said that he did not wish needlessly to occupy the time of the House.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY said he was not going to be outdone in courtesy by the hon. Gentleman, and would at once finish his speech.

Amendment proposed—

"In the Preamble, page 1, line 3, at the end to add, 'but consistently with the interests of the rural labouring classes and of the community generally in such investment.'"—(Colonel Kenyon-Slaney.)

Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to.

SIR FREDERICK BANBURY (City of London) rose to move to omit Sub-section 1 of Section 1 which amended the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1900. This sub-section repealed the proviso in the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1900, which limited the scope of the improvements in respect to which compensation was to be given. It did not give any description or indicate in any way what the improvements were for which the tenant was to be compensated, and that appeared to him to set a very bad precedent. The Agricultural Holdings Act of 1900 had been in operation for something like six years and had worked extremely well. He was aware there were some hon. Members on that side who thought that a portion of the Act of 1900 might be omitted, and that the words "the inherent capability of the soil" might be left out. For his part he did not think so, and when one considered what the expression meant, he thought it was obvious that these words should be retained. What the tenant should be compensated for was for what he himself had done, and he ought not to be compensated for what he had not done. If he developed "the inherent capabilities of the soil" he was simply doing his duty and he reaped the reward of good husbandry by the crops which his cultivation produced, and it seemed to him that it would be a mistake to remove this safeguard of the landlords' interest. There were a certain number of men among tenants who were called "scampers," who did not preserve "the inherent capabilities of the soil," their intention being to take as much out of the soil as they possibly could, and then go somewhere else. The preamble of the Bill said that it was brought forward "in the interest of good husbandry." Therefore it was not expedient to omit anything which was a safeguard for good husbandry. He thought the omission of the provision in the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1900, would tend to realise the fear which had been expressed that this Bill would only increase litigation and not benefit the landlord or the tenant, but only the lawyer. He did not want to say anything detrimental to the legal profession, but they were not averse to anything which brought business to them. He thought the proper limit of the tenants' claim for improvements should be the actual cost, but he would not go into that matter now because it was possible it might be brought up at a later stage.

And, it being Five of the clock, further consideration of the Bill, amended by the Standing Committee, stood adjourned.

Bill, as amended (by Standing Committee), to be further considered upon Friday next.

Whereupon Mr. SPEAKER, in pursuance of Standing Order No. 3, adjourned the House without Question put.

Adjourned at Four minutes after Five o'clock till Monday next.

NORTH SEA FISHERIES.

*THE EARL OF ONSLOW rose "To call attention to the proceedings of the International Council for the investigation of the North Sea; and to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries whether he would lay on the Table of the House the Reports of the British Delegates attending those meetings since the year 1902; and whether the investigations were likely to be continued after next year; and, if so, whether His Majesty's Government intended to take further part in them; and to move for Papers."

The Noble Earl said: My Lords, in putting these Questions I ask leave to direct your attention to the circumstances which have led up to the present state of affairs in connection with the International Council. The subject arose as long ago as the year 1885. At that time a Trawling Commission reported that there was undoubtedly a progressive diminution in the supply of edible fish in the North Sea, and shortly afterwards an invitation was received from Norway and Sweden to take part in some International Conference or Council to inquire into this important subject, affecting as it does the food supply of a large portion of the population both of this country and of our Continental neighbours. The Foreign Office replied that Great Britain would join—

> "if it is clearly understood that the main object with which the proposed researches are to be undertaken is the question as to whether any existing methods of fishing are or are not exercising a detrimental effect on the supplies of fish."

That has been the key note of the position of this country throughout the whole of the sittings of the Council, but I am afraid that it has not, at any rate not until quite recently, been regarded with that weight and deference which I think are due to a country so largely interested in fishing as is Great Britain and Ireland.

The delegates who were sent to the preliminary conference were instructed to propose a thorough scheme for obtaining statistical information as to the quantity and quality of fish obtained by different methods of fishing; and it was agreed that we should join for two years provided that before the end of that time the Council had collated and analysed the sea fishery investigations already made by the different countries. It was then proposed that Great Britain should charter a special steamer to carry on the work of the Council; but it was pointed out by the officials of the Department concerned—namely, the Board of Trade—that a steamer working 280 days at fifteen hours a day could only cover seventeen square miles, whereas the trawlable area of the North Sea was 100,000, and that it would therefore be of little use to collect statistics only by special steamers.

Further meetings were held, and, in the year 1901, this country agreed to adhere to the scheme and to grant a sum of £12,000 in three years, and, if satisfied with the work, to extend that grant for two more years. That, my Lords, will bring the termination of the period during which this country agreed to contribute to the International Council to the month of July, 1907. I am, therefore, anxious to know whether His Majesty's Government have taken into consideration the results of the work of the Council, whether they are satisfied with it, whether they have been invited to continue beyond the period of five years, and, if they have, whether they intend to do so. I venture to think, from the short experience I had when at the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries, that we have not received value for our money, and I am very anxious indeed that His Majesty's Government, while there is yet time, should take this into their serious consideration, and that if they are pressed to continue the work of the Council and to act with other nations on the Council, they will, at any rate, see that we get good value for our money.

The money allotted by this country has been administered by a Committee consisting of representatives (1) of the Treasury; (2) of, first, the Board of Trade, and afterwards, when the Fisheries Department was transferred to the Board of Agriculture, of the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries; and (3) of the Scottish Office. The expenditure, however, has not been incurred in the collection of statistics, which from the outset it was the intention of His Majesty's Government should be the principal work of the Council, but it has been incurred on the two steamers, one the property of the Scottish Fishery Board and the other the property of a private association called the Marine Biological Association.

The Conference met in Copenhagen in 1902. The British delegates were instructed that statistics should be obtained from a sufficient number of vessels to be representative of the whole of the trawling trade. They were told that—

> "His Majesty's Government cannot help feeling that with the small number of surveying vessels available, investigations may be of too superficial a character to inspire confidence."

What was true then is true to-day. In 1903 an Act was passed transferring the Fishery Department from the Board of Trade to the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries, and, being at the head of that Board, I called for a report from the Marine Biological Association and the Scottish Fishery Board as to what extent the instructions given to the delegates, which had been the policy of His Majesty's Government from the very beginning, had been carried out. We were informed by the Marine Biological Association that they were quite unable to supply that information, as it would cause serious inconvenience to the current work they were engaged on in connection with the international scheme. We then wrote to the International Bureau asking whether the scheme included investigation at various ports of landing into the number and size of fish brought by commercial vessels from the known grounds, and the reply we received was that schemes for investigation at ports of landing were to be prepared by the convener of committees, but none had yet been sent in.

The instructions given to our delegates attending the next Conference were—

> "It appears now to be generally recognised that the most practically efficient means of extending knowledge of fishing problems is to utilise the material brought in by commercial fishing vessels from known fishing grounds at the termination of each trip, by the examination at the ports of landing of large quantities of fish, with a view to ascertaining their size, sexual maturity, rate of growth, and other conditions."

I subsequently introduced into this House a Bill which had for its object the prevention of the catching of immature or under-sized fish in the well-known nursery grounds. That Bill was referred to a Select Committee of your Lordships' House, who reported that in their opinion there was a continuous and serious diminution of the number of fish in the North Sea, and that it was time some active steps were taken. After that it was necessary to consider the position of this country at the end of the first three years, and it was determined that it was not advisable to interfere with the existing state of affairs until the termination of the five years.

The question for the consideration of His Majesty's Government is whether this country is sufficiently represented, and whether her views have adequate weight on the International Council. The Council consists of two representatives of each of the participating States, viz., Great Britain, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Russia, and Finland. The Council acts through a bureau, which is composed of three ordinary and four extraordinary members. The ordinary members are Dr. Herwig, Germany; Professor Petersson Sweden; and Dr. Hoek, Holland. The extraordinary members are Dr. Drecshell, Denmark; Professor von Grimme, Russia; Professor Nanse, Norway; and Professor D'Arcy Thompson, Scotland. It will thus be seen that on the Council England has but one vote out of eighteen, and on the bureau none. Yet England is by far the greatest fishing Power, her trawling industry being three times greater than that of all the other Powers bordering on the North Sea combined. In any proposal to reduce the sea area of moderate depth—which is available to trawling vessels of all nations in common—by an increase of the three mile territorial limit, her interests, therefore, are necessarily opposed to those of the other nations, since she has more to lose and less to gain than any other Power. The last meeting of the Council was held in 1905 at Copenhagen, and the delegates were again instructed to press very strongly for an examination of the statistics which had already been collected, and for the formulating of some scheme for further collection. I am glad to say that that was adopted by the Council, but it was adopted in 1905 instead of in 1902, and I am afraid it is very unlikely that much progress will be made in regard to it during this year. The Council was furnished with a report from the convener of Committee B, which is the one that deals with statistics, and he said that the analyses and collection of the data would require considerable time, and that he hoped an opportunity would be afforded for full consideration before the time arrived for drawing up the definitive report of the Committee. In the meantime he submitted an ad interim report, in regard to which the Council returned thanks for the pains he had taken, but declined to accept responsibility for the conclusions contained in his report.

When I first put this notice on the Paper of your Lordships' House, the Blue-book which I hold in my hand had not been presented to Parliament, and it was my intention to ask the noble Earl the President of the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries to lay these Papers on the Table of the House. But, even now, we have not got anything like all the information we wish to have. The Blue-book does not contain the preliminary report of the Marine Biological Association upon which the Council reported adversely; neither does it contain any account of the proceedings which took place in February of this year, and which account is necessary to elucidate all that is set out in the Blue-book. I do not think that the results have been in any way commensurate with the expenditure of the International Council. What we want to know is, Is there over-fishing? Is there destruction of small and immature fish? And on that we have no information whatever, although the Council has been sitting for over four years. It is true that the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries has made some investigations on its own account, but not out of money provided for the International Council.

I believe that a much better way of attaining the object we have in view would be to follow the recommendation contained in the Report of the Royal Commission presided over by the noble Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in which it was urged that there should be established in each Department concerned an independent and efficient branch charged with fishery matter only, including the collection of statistics and carrying out of investigations and experiments. If that were done, instead of an expenditure of between £14,000 and £15,000 a year which this country has been incurring for the past five years, we might for a sum of £4,000 or £5,000 have a most important collection of statistics. We might have investigation at all the ports of landing; we might have adequate analyses; we might establish a laboratory of our own; and we might obtain some results which would at any rate inform us as to whether or not we are depleting the North Sea, and, if we are, how we can avoid doing so in future; and that without of necessity communicating the results to rival fishing nations.

I have not ventured, because I do not consider myself in a position to do so, to criticise the proceedings of either the Scottish Fishery Board or the Marine Biological Association, but I do humbly submit to your Lordships that they are not being conducted on the right lines, because they are being carried out with individual vessels that can only traverse a very small portion of the trawlable area of the North Sea. I wish I could stop there. But I am bound, in view of certain remarks made by the President of the Marine Biological Association at a meeting of the Society of Arts, to call your Lordships' attention to a reflection upon the officials of the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries. Speaking of the Marine Biological Association Professor Ray Lankester said—

> "No kind of assistance or even goodwill had ever been received by the Association from the paid officials connected with fishery matters in this country. Their work had been hindered and threatened by the jealousy of highly paid officials, who failed to understand the importance of the work of the Association."

I heard my noble friend Viscount St. Aldwyn the other night characterise statements in a notice on the Paper of your Lordships' House as utterly untrue and worthy only of the gutter Press. If that is language suitable to your Lordships' House I can only say, having had the honour of presiding over the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries, that it adequately described my feelings when I read that attack by one member of the Civil Service upon other members of the Civil Service officials of that Department who are not in a position to reply except through their representatives in Parliament. I greatly regret that such a statement should have been made, because I am satisfied that the officials of my noble friend's Department are anxious to act only in the public interest, in the interest of the trawling industry, which has a large amount of British capital invested in it, and which provides food for an enormous mass of the people of this country and especially the poorest of the poor. I sincerely hope that my noble friend will be able to assure me that His Majesty's Government either have given or will give this matter their serious consideration and endeavour to obtain the scientific and statistical information which we have consistently pressed for, and that if they cannot get that by adhering for a further period to the International Council they will be prepared to get it on their own account.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE AND FISHERIES (Earl CARRINGTON): My Lords, before I answer the questions that have been put to me by the noble Earl I wish to thank him in the name of the civil servants in my office for the defence he has made on their behalf. I was not aware that any such attack as that quoted by the noble Earl had been made, and I thank my noble friend very sincerely for his words. Though it may not be necessary to use the strong language to which the noble Earl referred, yet at the same time such undeserved attacks cannot be too severely condemned. With regard to the noble Earl's question, I may say at once that I greatly regret that the preliminary Report has been omitted. The noble Earl placed his notice on the Paper some three weeks ago, and in consequence we have issued the Reports of the British delegates attending the meetings of the International Council in the years 1903, 1904, and 1905. The Council met in February this year at Amsterdam, but the British delegates have not yet been able to send in their Report. As soon as we receive it we shall place it at the disposal of the noble Earl and the House. The destruction of immature fish, to which the attention of the Board has been directed, is, I venture to think, a separate question, and I will therefore confine myself entirely to the proceedings of the Council.

My noble friend the Chairman of Committees has explained the facts to the House and has correctly stated that a grant of £15,000 a year was made by the Treasury towards the expenses of the International Council. The five years, as the noble Earl has stated, will end on July 22nd next year, and then, and not until then, it will be the duty of His Majesty's Government to consider how, if at all, they propose to continue this grant. The question has not yet been considered by His Majesty's Government, and therefore it is impossible for me to give any decided statement at the present moment as to what the proposal of the Government will be. But I can assure the noble Earl that we are fully alive to the importance of the subject. The number of the British vessels engaged in steam trawling is seven times as great as that of all the vessels belonging to other countries put together. The instructions to the British delegates have been very succinct and very clear. The delegates attending the Copenhagen meeting in 1905 and the Amsterdam meeting in 1906 clearly contemplated the conclusion of the work of the Council at the end of the five years. In 1905 they were instructed that His Majesty's Government did not intend to continue the expenditure after the expiry of the five years, and this year they have been instructed to impress on the Council the importance of considering the lines on which they will next year draw up their Report, with a view to arriving at a definite conclusion by July, 1907. They were instructed to impress on their foreign colleagues that it is not the intention of His Majesty's Government to participate in the investigations on the present footing after July 22nd, 1907. I will not go into the practical suggestions which have been made by the noble Earl, but I can promise him that they will receive every consideration and attention at the hands of His Majesty's Government.

*LORD HENEAGE: My Lords, after what has fallen from the noble Earl the President of the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries I feel compelled to say something on behalf of the National Sea Fisheries Association, of which I am president. I do not think the answer is at all what we would have expected after reading the Report, and I hope my noble friend is not going back on what has been stated—that the Council were to prepare their Report with a view to the inquiry coming to an end at the termination of the five years. I am quite certain that those engaged in the fishing industry are very much indebted to the noble Earl for having brought this question forward.

It ought to be pointed out that the fishing industry have never been consulted from first to last with regard to this scientific inquiry. The National Sea Fisheries Association represent the whole of the industry of Great Britain and Ireland and comprise other trades connected more or less with it; the members of that association have millions of money invested in this trade; and yet from first to last we have never been asked to give any advice or given any representation with regard to this inquiry. Since the association was founded, nearly a quarter of a century ago, with the exception of the three years from 1900 to 1903, we have always had the most friendly relations with the presidents of the Board, but I am sorry to say that those relations became very strained during the last two years of Mr. Ritchie's presidency and during the whole of Mr. Gerald Balfour's presidency, and the result was the Resolution carried at the Grimsby Conference and the separation of the Sea Fisheries Department altogether from the Board of Trade.

The Sea Fisheries Association, as I have said, was not consulted in this matter. They were not given any representation on the inquiry and no one was sent from the Board of Trade to represent officially the sea fishing interest. It was agreed to spend £42,000 spread over three years, and £18,500 was handed over to the Scottish Fishery Board, which is not at all in agreement with the English fishing industry on many important questions, and another £18,500 to the Biological Society at Lowestoft, £5,000 being retained for incidental and miscellaneous expenses by the Board of Trade. The whole of the interests of the great fishing industry in the United Kingdom were thus handed over to a local fishery board in Scotland and to a scientific body at Lowestoft without any official representatives whatever.

I should like to remind your Lordships who the representatives were at the first meeting of the Council. The British representatives were the Minister at Copenhagen, Professor D'Arcy Thompson (of the Scottish Fishery Board), Mr. Mills (of the British Rainfall Association), and Mr. Garstang of the Biological Association at Lowestoft. Those were our representatives. There was not on the Council as representing this country one single practical person connected either with the Fishery Board in London or the Association of which I am president. In 1904 my noble friend Lord Onslow, who was then President of of the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries, consulted our association and very kindly attended personally the discussion which took place as to whether we should approve of another two years extension of the inquiry. We emphatically said no. We held that it was doing more harm than good, and that if the Government had that money to spare we would rather they handed it over to the Fishery Board to spend for the benefit of our own nation. We were told, however, that it could not be helped and that for some diplomatic reason or another it must be extended for two years. But my noble friend did manage to get more representation for us. We had Mr. Archer, one of our ablest officials at the Board at Whitehall, Mr. Masterman, and a gentleman from Ireland put upon the inquiry, and they have been upon it ever since.

But what is the real result of this inquiry? We have gained nothing whatever for the fishing industry in this country. On the other hand, we have handed over a great deal of information which our practical fishermen have gained during the last twenty years or more to foreign countries for their advantage and for which they are paying a very small sum indeed. That is a very serious matter. Only last year the various associations round the coast and the different smack owners were asked to send in returns, not only of how much fish their vessels got, but in what particular parts of the North Sea the fish were caught, and at what times of the year. We are, therefore, handing over to other countries knowledge as to the best places at which to fish, the best times of the year to go there, and the kinds of fish that can be caught at particular times. It is well known that Germany is at the present moment fitting out a fishing fleet which will be ready in the course of a couple of years, and that they have already established in Germany a Fishery Department. Moreover, they have founded a journal for all the information they can get, and anyone who has read that journal will see that they are not very friendly towards this country.

We have had, as I say, no representatives on the inquiry. Scotland, however has; but on two important points the Scottish Fishery Board is entirely at variance with the English Fishery Board and the National Sea Fisheries Association. In the first place, we distinctly desire to uphold freedom of sale for foreign vessels in all our ports and that hospitality which we have always obtained in consequence from other nations. We also entirely repudiate the idea of the three-mile territorial limit being increased, for it will not be to our benefit, but to the benefit of other countries; whilst the Scottish Fishery Board are in favour both of preventing foreign vessels selling in English ports and of increasing the territorial limits. We cannot consider, therefore, that they represent the great fishing industry in this country, and we certainly do not consider, however scientific they may be, that we can put all our faith in the Biological Association. This inquiry may be of great interest to scientists, but it will be a great loss so far as the fishing industry in this country is concerned. I speak for the trawling industry in Scotland as well as the whole of the fishing industry in this country. We desire that an end shall be put at the conclusion of the five years to this inquiry, and that there shall be no more money thrown away upon it.

THE EARL OF ONSLOW: I understand that my noble friend the President of the Board has no objection to laying Papers on the Table of the House, and I therefore move for Papers.

Moved, "That there be laid before the House further Papers relating to the procedings of the International Council for the investigation of the North Sea."—(The Earl of Onslow.)

On Question, Motion agreed to.

THE MERCANTILE MARINE.

LORD MUSKERRY: My Lords, I rise to ask His Majesty's Government whether, if the wages of seamen of merchant vessels are improperly withheld by their employers, it is enacted that the wages shall continue to run and be payable until time of the final settlement thereof; and, if so, to ask whether in view of cases which have happened of improper withholding of the wages of masters of merchant vessels by their owners, His Majesty's Government will be prepared to insert an Amendment to the Merchant Shipping Bill which will give masters the same rights as seamen in respec to their wages continuing to run whenthere is any improper withholding of moneys earned by them in the course of their employment.

As the law stands at preent, the captains of our merchant ships are exposed to the most barefaced robbery. Under the Merchant Shipping Act all persons on board a vessel who have signed on, no matter whether they wear trousers or petticoats, or possess any knowledge of seamanship, are seamen, with two exceptions—namely, the captain of the vessel and the apprentices if the ship carries any. I will tell your Lordships how this injustice works out. A seaman who has some dispute about his or her pay receives from the shipowners every farthing up to the date of the final settlement of the dispute—that is to say, the seaman may be on shore for a year or two doing nothing, yet when the matter is finally settled he is paid for every day spent on shore up to the date of the final settlement. The captain of the vessel, not being a seaman under the Act, has not those advantages, and the consequence is that the moment he is thrown out of employment the payment to him ceases.

Your Lordships may remember that I gave a striking example last year of how this provision works. A certain captain of a sailing vessel met with very bad weather and had to put into port in America to refit. This was an underwriters' job, and the underwriters had such a high opinion of the captain's knowledge of seamanship that they asked him to oversee the repairs that were required. The junior partner of the owning firm, however, went to this port. He found great fault with the captain and finally said to him, "Now, captain, according to your agreement I give you a week's notice and you must go." There was a considerable sum to the credit of the ship, and at the junior partner's request the captain drew a cheque in his favour for that amount. This captain had been in the service of the particular firm for 18 years. The captain naturally did not expect the treatment he was going to receive, and he said, "What about my wages?" The money due to the captain amounted to about £124. "Oh," replied the junior partner, "you may go and be damned. You will get paid when you return to Liverpool and not before." The captain was, therefore, left stranded. He had to cable to England to his wife to send out money to pay his passage home. The wife happened to be an invalid and was away at the time at some watering place, with the result that the money was not sent out. He then managed to borrow the money and returned home. The captain went to the office of this company, which was in Liverpool, and asked for his money, producing all his vouchers, every one of which was duly signed. The reply he received was, "We cannot pay you. You must wait till we hear from the captain who replaced you in the ship." The ship had in the meantime gone to Sydney. Finally, a writ on the captain's behalf was served on this firm, who then applied to Mr. Justice Bargrave Deane, in Chambers, to have the action of the writ suspended till they could hear from the new captain, but his Lordship saw no reason for this. "You have all the papers before you," he said; "you have all the vouchers, and I shall treat this hearing in Chambers as a hearing in Court, and give a verdict for the plaintiff." This is a case which happened last year. I am informed, and believe it to be true, that there is a practice among certain managing shipowners of withholding the payment to captains for some considerable time. The process is known among them as "starving the captain." Eventually they say to the captain who is, of course, losing money, having his family to keep up, "We will give you so much"—possibly a half or a quarter of what is due to him—"and we will give you a good reference." The unfortunate captain accepts that offer and goes off with half, or less, of what is due to him. I contend that that is nothing less than bare-faced robbery. If the captain were a seaman under the Act no managing owner would attempt to do such a thing, because during all the time of waiting for the settlement his pay would be accruing.

There is another matter which I think ought to be looked into. It is very doubtful whether the sums withheld from the captains ever go into the shareholders' account. The idea is that the managing owner takes the money as a sort of commission. Therefore, I think it is necessary, now that the Government are promoting a Merchant Shipping Bill, that masters should be included in the designation of seamen. It does seem an absurd thing that you should describe a stewardess, say, who goes on board for the first time, and a fireman who may never have been at sea before, as a seaman, and that the captain of the vessel, who occupies his position by reason of his superior knowledge of seamanship, should not be a seaman under the Act. I therefore hope His Majesty's Government will give a favourable Answer to the Questions I have placed on the Paper.

THE EARL OF GRANARD: My Lords, the law with regard to the payment of wages of seamen has been correctly stated by my noble friend. The Board of Trade take the view that masters are in a much better position than seamen to make such conditions as they may consider necessary to safeguard their own interests. Any agreement which a master makes with his employer as to the payment of his salary is separate, and of an entirely different character from an agreement made between the master and his crew. His Majesty's Government, therefore, are of opinion that there is no reason for any special legislation on this subject, and they do not propose to bring it in under the Bill which they intend introducing in your Lordships' House in the course of next month.

LORD MUSKERRY: My Lords, to put myself in order, I beg to move the adjournment of the House. I desire to correct one statement made by the noble Earl. The master of a ship is not in a better but in a much inferior position. There are plenty of masters, but few berths going for masters, and there is considerable difficulty in getting seamen, hence the large number of foreign seamen and aliens in the merchant service. But there are plenty of officers holding masters' certificates. The master is, unfortunately, bound to fall in with the agreement made. He is compelled to accept the terms imposed by the shipowner, and I think it is a monstrous thing that a man with his professional qualifications should be dismissed at one week's notice, which is less than would have to be given to a domestic servant. When the Government's Merchant Shipping Bill is in your Lordships' House, I shall move an Amendment on these lines.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (The Marquess of RIPON): I do not wish to interrupt my noble friend, but he has made a second speech upon a Question. There is no Motion before the House, and I hope my noble friend will excuse me for saying that he has been slightly irregular.

AGRICULTURAL INSTITUTIONS.

*LORD BARNARD: My Lords, I rise to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he has been able to consider the representations made to the Secretary of the Board, on December 5th last, by a deputation from universities, colleges, and agricultural institutions; and whether there is any prospect of an increased grant to such institutions.

In the autumn of last year the various university institutions of this country which are engaged in the teaching of and research in agriculture, finding that the Government grant was not sufficient to enable them to carry out their work satisfactorily, organised a deputation to the then President of the Board of Agriculture in order to press upon him their claims for an increase in that grant. Unfortunately, on the date fixed for the deputation Mr. Fellowes, the then President, although he had not yet gone out of office, thought that the circumstances were such that he would not be justified in receiving the deputation; but as the gentlemen composing the deputation had come long distances, it was felt that it would be inconvenient to put them off, and with great courtesy the officials of the Board of Agriculture determined that Sir Thomas Elliott should receive the deputation. This he did on December 5th, and in reply to the representations which were then made he gave us a very sympathetic answer, and promised to lay those representations before the new President of the Board as soon as he came into office. I have no doubt that he did so, and that my noble friend Earl Carrington has studied them.

In asking the Question standing in my name, may I be permitted to impress upon the noble Earl that, as was stated by the deputation, we are not asking for money exclusively for instruction, but that we appeal to be placed on the same footing as other countries in being assisted by the Government with the means for carrying on agricultural research. I know it is a difficult thing to press for Government help for this and that object, but I venture to think that this is one of those objects which, without such help, cannot be attained at all. Very large profits are made in many branches of industry in this country which are represented by technical instruction in the colleges, and the great captains of industry in those centres are no doubt able to assist very largely by pecuniary means the endowment both of research and instruction. But we all know the utter impossibility of obtaining such assistance from the agricultural industry. Therefore we look to be put upon an equal footing with foreign countries. I believe that all foreign countries assist very materially in this particular line, and I think I am right in saying that in England we are behind even Scotland, and certainly behind Ireland, in regard to Government help for this particular object.

I sincerely hope that if the noble Earl the President of the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries cannot promise us a grant in the immediate future, he will hold out some hope of further assistance of some kind. At Armstrong College we found it impossible during the past year, and it will be impossible in the present year, to carry on the agricultural department, of which I have the honour to be president, without additional support. The result is that we had to go to the council of the college last year and beg for an extra grant of £100 a year, and I hold in my hand a letter from the secretary of the college, intimating that the council had agreed to this grant for a further year, but had expressed the opinion that it was high time the State did more for agricultural education. The money voted for this purpose at the present moment is £10,000. The addition of a few thousand pounds would make all the difference.

EARL CARRINGTON: My Lords, the deputation to which the noble Lord has referred was a very important one, as it represented the universities and five or six colleges. It was introduced, I think, by Sir Isambard Owen, and letters of sympathy were sent by the Duke of Northumberland and other noble Lords who were unable to be present. The noble Lord who has called attention to the matter to-day himself made an important speech on that occasion, and probably no one had a greater right to speak than my noble friend, who is chairman of the agricultural committee of the Armstrong College. In his speech the noble Lord then urged that help should be given to those who helped themselves, and he has brought before your Lordships this afternoon an instance of how the subject is being tackled in the Armstrong College and the way in which they have helped themselves.

I can say that His Majesty's Government appreciate all these efforts to provide better facilities for agricultural education. I think everybody will agree that no money could be better spent than that applied in helping farmers to meet the fierce and growing competition which they have to encounter from all sides. The Exchequer has not been ungenerous to my Department. In 1889 £4,500 a year was voted towards this object, and in 1906 the Vote had risen to £11,500. The sum is small, it is true, when compared with the amounts voted in other countries, but it is satisfactory to note that the country has received the full value of the grant owing to the cordial co-operation and good work of the different county councils.

It must not be forgotten that the burden of public expenditure is already heavy, and that it is proposed to provide an extra £1,000,000 for the maintenance of Church schools. At the same time I think that this question is one which might receive the practical consideration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I would venture to propose to the noble Lord that some inquiry should be held into the system of agricultural education. There has been no inquiry since 1888—nearly twenty years ago. If it should appear, as I venture to think it would, that there is good ground for an increase of grant, I think those who advocate such an increase would find their hands strengthened very considerably, and it would be possible for us to address ourselves to the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject with stouter hearts. The Government are grateful to the noble Lord for putting the Question, as it gives us an opportunity of expressing our full sympathy with the object he has in view and our earnest desire to see those objects carried out at the earliest possible opportunity.

THE EARL OF ONSLOW: Might I suggest to the noble Earl that the money he saves from the International Council on Fisheries could be given for agricultural education ?

GROUND GAME BILL.

Order of the day for the Second Reading read.

LORD BURCHCLERE: My Lords, this Bill only appeared on the notice paper for Second Reading this morning. As your Lordships are aware, it is usual that a Bill coming from the other House, as this one does, should be put down within a certain time; but I am aware that there are many noble Lords interested in this question, and I think it would perhaps be convenient that they should have longer notice before the Second Reading of the Bill is taken. I therefore propose, with your Lordships' permission, not to take the Second Reading until Tuesday, July 3rd.

House adjourned at twenty minutes before Six o'clock, till to-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Property and Estate Laws in the Transvaal.

MR. GROVE (Northamptonshire, S.): To ask Mr. Attorney-General whether, seeing that in the case of the death of a trustee holding property in the Transvaal succession or estate duty in respect of the trust estate is levied, he will take steps to bring the English and Transvaal laws into harmony, and so remove the disabilities under which English subjects holding property in the Transvaal suffer.

(Answered by Sir John Walton.) It is assumed that the Question refers to English succession or estate duty, and to the death of a person domiciled in the United Kingdom (see Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (2). The general rule is that neither succession duty nor estate duty is leviable in the United Kingdom on the death of a trustee, as no change in the beneficial enjoyment of property is involved. As to succession duty, this is not expressly provided, but it follows from s. 2 of The Succession Duty Act, 1853. As to estate duty, there is an express provision,

s. 2 (3) of The Finance Act, 1894. If the case put in the Question falls within either of the two exceptions referred to in the above sub-section, the grievance can only be that duty is charged here and also in the Transvaal in respect of the same property. Grievances of this nature are intended to be met by s. 20 of The Finance Act, 1894. This section has not, however, been applied to the Transvaal, the reason being that the conditions under which an Order in Council may apply the section have not been satisfied. There was some correspondence last year between the Colonial Office and the Transvaal Government with regard to legislation in that colony necessary to enable His Majesty in Council to apply the section. The Inland Revenue Department are not cognisant of the stage which this correspondence has now reached. There appears to be no case for altering the English law, but any Question directed to that object should be addressed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It is not known whether under the Transvaal law duty is payable on the death of a trustee (as such). I have no power to obtain any alteration in the Transvaal law, and if such alteration is desired, application should be made to the Colonial Office.

Duties of Auxiliary Postman at Derrybrien, County Galway.

MR. DUFFY (Galway, S.): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that the rural auxiliary postman for Derrybrien, Gort, county Galway, has been employed in that office for over twenty-one years; has any revision taken place in his wages in consequence of the house to house delivery; how many miles were added to his daily average as a consequence of the fresh duties imposed upon him; and will he take all the circumstances into consideration with a view of increasing his wages.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I am not acquainted with the circumstances of the case referred to, but I will have inquiry made on the subject, and will afterwards communicate with the hon. Member.

Workmen's Compensation Act—Restaurant Staff as Domestic Servants.

MR. TENNANT (Berwickshire): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether waiters and cooks in restaurants, and potmen, and barmaids are domestic servants within the meaning of that term in the Workmen's Compensation Bill; or whether, being merely workmen, they will come within the scope of the Bill.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) I am advised that waiters, potmen, barmaids, and, speaking generally, cooks in restaurants, are not domestic servants within the meaning of that term in the Workmen's Compensation Bill, but the question is one of fact to be decided on the circumstance in each case. The circumstance which is generally considered as most important to show that a servant is a domestic servant is that of residence in the master's house.

Shorthand Notes of the Poplar Inquiry.

SIR F. BANBURY (City of London): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether shorthand notes of the proceedings at the Poplar inquiry are being taken; and whether they will be available to Members of this House.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I have arranged for shorthand notes of the proceedings being taken. The notes would only be available to Members of the House if they were printed and issued as a Parliamentary Paper. I propose to defer she consideration of the question whether this should be done until after the completion of the inquiry.

Extra Delivery of Letters at Carrigallen, County Leitrim.

MR. T. F. SMYTH (Leitrim, S.): To ask the Postmaster-General if he will grant a mid-day delivery of letters in Carrigallen, county Leitrim, as the inhabitants there suffer inconvenience from having only one daily delivery of letters, seeing that Carrigallen is only six miles from Killeshandra, and that the extra cost would only be about £22 yearly.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I have called for a report on this subject, and on its receipt I will communicate with the hon. Member.

Officer in Charge of Magilligan Camp Post Office.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): To ask the Postmaster-General under what circumstances a Dublin relief clerk, temporarily employed in the Londonderry office, has been selected to take charge of the Magilligan Camp this season, seeing that in former years this duty has been reserved for the staff at Londonderry, and their supercession on this occasion will entail financial loss.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I will make inquiry and will communicate with the hon. Member.

Responsibility to Parliament of the Estates Commissioners.

MR. GINNELL (Westmeath, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the fact that the Estates Commissioners are themselves answerable to Parliament, there is any precedent or analogy for refusing to answer an inquiry with reference to one of their non-judicial subordinates, whose work has been declared incorrect by a county court judge; and whether he will now furnish the House with information in the case in question.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I think the hon. and learned Member has somewhat misapprehended the reply which I gave to his former Question on the 20th instant. It was intended to convey that the responsibility for the action taken by the Estates Commissioners in the case of M'Glone rests entirely upon them, and not upon their inspector, who inquired into the case by their direction and on their behalf. The Commissioners are considering the question whether they will take steps to test the decision of the county court judge, and until this question has been decided it will not be convenient to give further information in the case.

Defective Sight of Naval Officers.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether, with a view to the safety of His Majesty's ships and their crews, the Admiralty hold the Commander-in-Chief of a station responsible that cases of defective vision on the part of officers commanding ships are reported to the Admiralty; and whether the officer commanding a ship is in a similar manner held responsible in the case of his officers.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) It is naturally the duty of Commanders-in-Chief and Commanding Officers of ships to report any circumstances affecting the capacity of an officer to perform the duties for which he is responsible, but it has not been considered necessary to specify any particular defect as calling for a special report.

Education Authorities and Instruction in Agricultural Co-operation.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): To ask the President of the Board of Education whether the circular of 13th June, 1902, addressed to county councils and enclosing the Minute of 16th April, 1902, authorising the Buckinghamshire County Council, under Section 8 of the Technical Instruction Act, 1889, to include in their syllabus instruction in the principles and practice of agricultural co-operation, resulted in applications from other county councils, and in the sanctioning of this subject of instruction in other counties, and, if so, in which counties; whether, in pursuance of their powers under Section 2 of the Education Act, 1902, any local education authorities, and, if so, how many, have applied to the Board of Education to sanction the inclusion of the principles and practice of agricultural co-operation in their syllabus of technical instruction; and whether any county, county borough, or other education committees for the purposes of elementary education have applied to the Board of Education for their sanction for teaching this subject in any school under their control, and, if so, in which counties or districts, and in how many instances.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The circulars referred to were issued by the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries after consultation with the Board of Education. The Board of Education sanctioned the subject "Principles and Practice of Agricultural Co-operation," by Minute under The Technical Instruction Act, 1889, on 16th April, 1902, on the representation of the Buckinghamshire County Council that it was a form of instruction suitable to the circumstances of the district. This subject was similarly sanctioned in respect of the areas of fourteen other county councils, viz., Carnarvon, Cheshire, East Sussex, Staffordshire, Essex, East Suffolk, Pembroke, Oxford, Leicester, Shropshire, Carmarthen, Rutland, Cardigan, Devonshire. The Education Act, 1902, rendered obsolete those Minutes of the late Science and Art Department, and made it unnecessary for county councils to obtain the express sanction of the Board of Education for the recognition of any particular subject as a branch of technical instruction. I am not in a position to furnish the number of authorities which now include in their programme of technical instruction any classes on the "Principles and Practice of Agricultural Co-operation." I am not aware that any local authorities for elementary education have attempted to teach children in any public elementary school "The Principles and Practice of Agricultural Co-operation," but I think it hardly likely that an attempt has been made, or, if made, would be fruitful; at all events, in any but the higher classes in those few schools where an unusual number of children attend until fourteen and fifteen years of age.

The Burtonport Railway.

MR. MACVEIGH (Donegal, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to a resolution passed on the 11th inst. by the County Council of Donegal, confirming resolutions passed on 23rd August and 16th October, 1905, calling for an inquiry, in the interest of the ratepayers of the guaranteeing area, and the public using the Burtonport Railway, and for the appointment of an arbitrator to inquire into the allegations made by the railway company as to the imperfect completion of the line, the insufficient equipment with engines and rolling stock, and the alleged improper expenditure of public money; and will he say when an arbitrator will be appointed to inquire into the matter and the working of the line generally.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) After very full and repeated consideration of all the circumstances of this case and in view of the terms of the Order in Council, and the agreement with the Treasury for the construction, etc., of the line, the Treasury has decided that it would not be justified in referring the matter to an outside tribunal. A similar Answer was given to unstarred Questions by the hon. Members for West and South Donegal on Monday last.† As regards the working of the line an improvement, has, I understand, already taken place some time ago, and I am not aware of any reason for pressing the Board of Trade to hold an inquiry into the matter.

Applications for Reinstatement from Evicted Tenants in North Roscommon.

MR. JAMES O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland how many applications for reinstatement from evicted tenants in North Roscommon have been received by the Estates Commissioners; in how many cases have the evicted tenants been restored to their holdings or given equivalent holdings; and what progress has been made in acquiring untenanted land for distribution among the tenants of uneconomical holdings in North Roscommon.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners records are not kept by Parliamentary divisions. The Commissioners have received applications from 156 persons seeking reinstatement in county Roscommon. The reinstatement of fourteen of these has been notified to them. The Commissioners have entered into agreements for the purchase of 1,112 acres of untenanted land, and are negotiating for the purchase of some 2,000 acres in addition

Sale of the Clements Estate, County Leitrim.

MR. DOLAN (Leitrim, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the sale of the Clements Estate at Manorhamilton, county Leitrim, under the Land Act of 1903, has been completed; is he aware that on the 22nd February last the rural district council of Manorhamilton adopted a resolution requesting the landlord to sell a grazing farm at Skreeny, included in the estates to the Estate Commissioners, with the view of providing sites for houses for the working classes in the town of Manorhamilton; has that resolution been considered by the Estates Commissioners; and, if not, would he have the circumstances investigated before the advance of the purchase money on this estate.

† See (4) Debates, clviii., 1344.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that the purchase agreements in respect of this estate have only now been lodged with them, and that consequently the sale will not be completed for a considerable time. The Commissioners have not received the resolution referred to, but will be prepared, when dealing with the estate, to consider any application upon the subject which they may receive.

Spread of Consumption in Ireland.

Sir THOMAS ESMONDE (Wexford, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if, in view of the spread of consumption in Ireland, the Government will consider whether any steps can be taken for dealing with the disease.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) This matter has been receiving the serious consideration of the Local Government Board, who are issuing to local authorities and medical officers of health circulars containing recommendations and instructions as to measures designed to check the spread of consumption.

Publication of Irish Historical Manuscripts.

Sir THOMAS ESMONDE: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if, in view of the mass of records and historical manuscripts at home and abroad relating to Ireland, which are unpublished and of the desirability of initiating their publication, he will arrange an opportunity of discussing the question before the end of the present session.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) An opportunity of discussing this question will, I take it, be afforded whenever the Estimates for the Irish Record Office may come under discussion. Those Estimates, however, do not belong to Irish Supply. I may remind the hon. Baronet that in recent years considerable progress has been made in the publication of historical manuscripts relating to Ireland. The Annals of Ulster and the Brehon Laws have been edited and published, and the publication in eight volumes of a calendar of the Justiciary Rolls of Ireland up to the 18th year of Richard II. has been authorised, as well as the publication of a volume containing the statutes and ordinances of the early Parliaments and great councils of Ireland. The Historical Manuscripts Commission and the English Record Office are each also engaged upon the publication of manuscripts relating to Ireland. I shall, however, be glad to receive any suggestions on the subject and to do my best to secure the proper editing and publication of these valuable records.

Sale of the Estate of Mrs. Adair, Mountmellick.

Mr. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that five tenants on the estate of Mrs. Adair, Mountmellick, Queen's County, have signed agreements to purchase their holdings at twenty-three years purchase, with bonus added, that the greater portion of the same estate was sold to the tenants eleven years ago at seventeen years purchase, and that the latter tenant purchasers have received one decadal reduction of 14 per cent., and are entitled to two more; and can he say what is the cause of the rise in price under the Act of 1903; and whether the Government propose introducing legislation to prevent such prices being demanded from the Irish tenant purchasers.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed by the Estates Commissioners that the facts are substantially as stated in the first part of the Question. I could not, within the limits of an Answer, attempt to enter upon a speculation as to the possible cause or causes of the rise in price. As I have already repeatedly stated, the Government are carefully watching the operations of the Land Purchase Acts, with the object of deciding whether amending legislation may be desirable, and I am not at present prepared to add anything to that statement.

Notices to Release Portions of the Bog in County Fermanagh.

MR. DOLAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland by what authority John Crawford, of Lavagh, county Fermanagh, served notices on John Crawford, junior, of Derryvan, county Fermanagh, Samuel Rooney, of Kinglass, county Fermanagh, and Mrs. Crawford, of Mullaghgarrow, to give up the portions of bog in the townland of Mullaghgarrow which had been secured to them in their investment orders when they were purchasing their holdings under the Land Purchase Act in 1892; whether the Earl of Enniskillen sold these portions of bog to John Crawford, of Lavagh; and whether he will give instructions to the Land Commission to see that these people are secured in the rights which they acquired by their terms of purchase.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Land Commission inform me that they have no knowledge of the proceedings referred to in the Question. If the tenant purchasers consider that their rights have been invaded, it is open to them, if so advised, to seek redress by legal proceedings. The matter is not one in which the Land Commission can intervene.

Terms of Purchase of the Carysfort Estate.

MR. COGAN (Wicklow, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a number of tenants on the Carysfort Estate, in the county of Wicklow, have memorialised the Estates Commissioners stating they have refused to agree to the terms of purchase demanded by the landlord, on the ground that they were exorbitant, and they would be unable to pay them; that in consequence the landlord has since harrassed them in various ways, and by duress sought to compel them to consent to his terms, and requesting the Commissioners to refuse to sanction the sale of any portion of the estate until the landlord agrees to reasonable terms of sale for the whole estate still unsold, and also requesting the Commissioners to intervene as negotiators and arbitrators between themselves and the landlord, stating they are willing to agree to any terms that may be settled by the Commissioners; and whether the Commissioners will accede to the tenants' request.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have received the memorial referred so. They have no present knowledge of the matters complained of, but will have them fully inquired into by their inspector when he visits the estate in connection with the proceedings for sale which have been instituted. The Commissioners will duly consider all the circumstances before sanctioning the sale of the estate.

Disturbance in Dublin at Distraint on Goods of Mr. Patrick O'Carroll.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the proceedings at an auction of coal, seized by the police to defray the fine imposed upon Mr. Patrick O'Carroll, a member of the Dublin Corporation, for having his name printed on his cart as Phadrig O'Cearbhaill, in Irish characters; whether he is aware that a crowd was attracted by handbills denouncing the Government, and declaring that the proceeds of the sale would be devoted to the part payment of the salaries of the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant and Sir Antony Macdonnell, and that the police had to be called in to quell the disorder; and whether proceedings will be instituted against the persons who organised this disturbance.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) Until this Question was put down my attention was not called to the proceedings referred to. The hon. Member will, I am sure, be delighted to learn that the disorder on the occasion referred to was not of a serious nature. It appears that some persons interrupted the proceedings, and that the police, at the request of the auctioneer, ejected the offenders. The police authorities inform me that, in their opinion, no further proceedings are necessary.

Alleged Boycotting of Mr. John Dowd, of Ryefield, County Roscommon.

MR. LONSDALE: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. John Dowd, of Ryefield, Elphin, county Roscommon, has complained to the police that he has been boycotted by direction of the United Irish League, and that Mr. Timothy Rorke, J.P., the United League Treasurer for North Roscommon, who is employed by the Congested Districts Board, had threatened to make it hot for him; and what action he proposes to take in this matter.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed by the police authorities that Mr. Dowd has not complained to the police that he has been boycotted, or that Mr. Rorke had threatened to make it hot for him. The police state that, as a matter of fact, Mr. Dowd has not been boycotted, and has not, so far as they are aware, suffered any inconvenience. Mr. Rorke is not in the employment of the Congested Districts Board, though he was temporarily employed for a short period, about fifteen days, last spring in placing grazing stock on the Board's lands. No action is called for in the matter.

Sale of Farms on Earl Fitzwilliam's Estate.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a number of tenants who refuse to purchase their farms from Earl Fitzwilliam, on the ground that the price demanded is excessive, have been notified by the Estates Commissioners, through Mr. Fottrell, solicitor, that they intend to exclude those tenants from the sale of the estate unless they write by return post agreeing to purchase on the landlord's terms; and, if so, will he make inquiries into the action of the Commissioners in these cases.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that in a few cases the tenants refused to accept the terms offered, upon the ground that these terms were excessive. In such cases the Commissioners required their inspector to state whether, in his opinion, the vendor's terms were reasonable, and the inspector's report was in the affirmative. As the tenants still refused to sign purchase agreements on these terms their holdings were excluded from the "declared" estate, upon the vendor's solicitor giving an undertaking that, as far as possible, these holdings would be included in a subsequent estate if terms acceptable to the tenants could be arranged. This course was taken in order to complete the proceedings for sale, affecting 1,055 tenants, upon that portion of the several estates for which agreements had been signed. The Commissioners have no information as to what communications passed between the solicitors for the vendor and the tenants. In such cases as these it is the practice to inform the tenants that their holdings have been excluded, but that an opportunity would be subsequently afforded them of coming to terms with their landlord, in which case their holdings would be included in another estate.

Payment of Cost by Patients obtaining Poor Law Medical Relief.

MR. MEAGHER (Kilkenny, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is competent for boards of guardians at their meeting subsequent to the admission of patients to the infirmaries or hospitals under their control, who seek relief by way of loan, to fix the amount which the patient or patients shall pay per day for their maintenance and attendance while in the hospital or infirmary; and, if not, whether, seeing that at the present time such patients contribute but a fraction of the cost which they bear on the rates, he will introduce a Bill granting boards of guardians the power to fix the rates of charges to patients who seek relief by way of loan, so as to include, in the case of patients who are able to pay, a part of the cost of medical and nursing attendance, and the actual cost of the dietary.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) In the opinion of the Local Government Board the answer to the first part of the Question is that the guardians have only a limited power under Section 4 of The Poor Relief (Ireland) Act, 1862, whereby they are empowered to charge patients in hospitals or infirmaries a portion of their cost, but such portion is in no case to exceed the average of the general cost of maintenance, medical and surgical treatment, in such hospitals or infirmaries. The Government are not prepared to consider the suggestion contained in the latter part of the Question pending the presentation of the Report of the Poor Law Reform Commission.

Maintenance and Patients Treated in the Kilkenny District Lunatic Asylum.

MR. MEAGHER: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the number of patients treated in the Kilkenny District Lunatic Asylum for the year 1897, and the total cost for the same, including maintenance and establishment charges, showing how much was raised by local rates and how much received from Government grants, and the average weekly cost per head in that year, and the details of the same information for the year 1905.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) In the calendar year 1897 the average number of patients in this asylum was 388; the total cost, including maintenance and establishment charges, was £9,127, of which £4,400 was raised by local rates and £3,212 received from Government grants; and the net average weekly cost per patient was 7s. 6d. The corresponding figures for the financial year ending 31st March, 1905, were, average number of patients, 452; total cost, £12,997; raised by local rates, £7,876; received from Government grants, £4,552; net average weekly cost, 8s. 10d.

Weekly Tenants and Payment of Rates on Cottages.

MR. MEAGHER: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware of the burden placed on the ratepayers of a number of unions in Ireland by the inability of weekly tenants of cottages to pay the rates levied on them; and whether, seeing that the rates on those cottages prior to the operation of the Local Government (Ireland) Act of 1898 were borne by the landlords, he will see his way to have that Act amended in order to revert to the old system, and so prevent the other ratepayers from having to meet increased taxation.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.)—I beg to refer to the replies which I gave to similar Questions on April 4th and May 16th,† when I stated fully the reasons why the Government are not prepared to introduce legislation on this subject.

Allocation of Grants for the Teaching of Irish.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the lack of prosperity in some parts of Ireland, he will discontinue the allocation of grants towards the teaching of Irish in national schools, with the object of securing more time being spent on learning other languages, seeing that a section of Irishmen object to contribute towards the cost of teaching Irish; and whether he can see his way to constitute the Irish language as a special subject, to be taught out of national school hours, and paid for by those parents desirous of having their children taught it.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.)—It is not proposed to discontinue the allocation of grants for the teaching of Irish, nor does the Irish Government believe that it would be possible, as the hon. Member seems to suggest, to introduce the general teaching of Greek, German, and other languages in Irish primary schools. Neither would it be an easy matter to give effect at the same time to all the wishes of every particular section of Irishmen. The suggestion in the last paragraph of the Question does not appear to be practicable.

Case of James Ward and the Castlebar Urban District Council.

MR. LONSDALE: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that James Ward, who was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment at the Sligo winter assizes, for having published a seditious libel against the Government and trying to prevent persons from enlisting in the Army and Navy, has been liberated three months in advance of the termination of his sentence; whether he is aware that James Ward, since his incarceration, has been unanimously co-opted a member of the Castlebar Urban Council; and whether in view of the fact that this man has been imprisoned for this offence, he will take steps to have the appointment cancelled.

---

† See (4) Debates, clv., 476; clvii., 482.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) James Ward has been released, by order of the Lords Justices, two and a half months before the termination of his sentence of nine months. He has, I am informed, been co-opted, but not unanimously, a member of the Castlebar Urban District Council. He does not appear to be disqualified from acting upon the district council. The Irish Government have no power to cancel appointments of this nature.

Evicted Tenants in County Clare.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will, in the interest of public peace and good feeling, see that the evicted tenants in county Clare are dealt with as soon as possible, and whether he can state the total number of Clare evicted tenants, and what steps are being taken for their restoration to holdings, so that their present state of idleness and suffering may be terminated.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have deputed one of their inspectors to inquire into the cases of the 217 evicted tenants who have lodged applications for reinstatement in county Clare. The inspector's inquiries will obviously take some time, but the matter will be pressed forward with as much despatch at possible.

Irish Intermediate Education Board Rules.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland when will the new rules of the Intermediate Education Board for Ireland be laid upon the Table of the House.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The rules were laid upon the Table on Friday last. They are substantially the rules approved in 1905 for the year 1906. The only changes which have been made are, I understand, a few minor changes consequent upon the alteration of the programme as regards some of the subjects. These changes do not in any way affect Irish as a subject of examination.

Government Board and Resolultion by Parliament.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether there is any precedent for a board, either in England or Ireland, deriving its authority and its finances from the Exchequer, refusing to adopt a Resolution unanimously agreed to by Parliament.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am not aware that there is any precedent, but I am also not aware that the case has arisen.

Revision Court for Carrickmore.

MR. MURNAGHAN (Tyrone, Mid.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he has received a Resolution, recently passed by the Omagh Board of Guardians, in reference to the necessity of a revision court at Carrickmore, in the Parliamentary Division of Mid-Tyrone; is he aware that householders, in order to get their names on the register of voters, have in many cases to travel ten, twelve and fourteen miles to the town of Sixmilecross, mostly on foot; and whether, in view of the value attached to electoral rights by the people of Tyrone, he will take steps to establish at Carrickmore a revision court in time for the Autumn revision.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Resolution in question has been received, and the necessary inquiries are being made with the object of submitting the matter for the decision of the Lord-Lieutenant in Council.

Local Government (Ireland) Act—Suggested Repeal of Clause 6.

Mr. MEAGHER: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the effect on the ratepayers of Ireland of the operation of Clause 6 of the Local Government (Ireland) Amending Act of 1902; and whether, seeing that the existence of this clause in the Act has given dissatisfaction to all the Poor Law unions of Ireland, and also so the officers of these bodies, he will see his way to have the clause repealed, or, as an alternative, will recommend the Treasury to accede to the request of the Poor Law Association of Ireland by giving an equivalent grant to the Poor Law unions of Ireland in aid of salaries.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Local Government Board have received from some unions requests for the repeal of the section quoted, but it is not the fact that the operations of the section has given dissatisfaction to all unions. I have already stated that it is not the intention of the Government as at present advised to take steps for the repeal of this section, and I would refer the hon. Member to my replies to Questions on the subject put by the hon. Member for South Cork on the 12th March† and 23rd May.‡

Local Government (Ireland) Act—Suggested Repeal of Section 83.

Mr. MEAGHER: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the difficulties in the way of the efficient working of the Parliamentary Voters' Acts, by the existence of Section 83 (7) of the Local Government (Ireland) Act of 1898; whether he is aware that the majority of the Irish Poor Law unions boards have, at repeated times, urged on the Irish Government the necessity for repealing this section in favour of having the work and the work under the Jurors Acts performed as heretofore by all clerks of unions; and whether he can see his way to have this section repealed.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) By the enactment referred to, the duty of preparing voters and jurors' lists was transferred from clerks of unions to secretaries of county councils. In the opinion of the Local Government Board, this enactment does not hinder but facilitates the efficient working of the Parliamentary Voters and Jurors Acts. It is the fact that a number of boards of guardians have from time to time asked for the repeal of the section in question, but it was found that there was a consensus of opinion on the part of county court judges and revising barristers in favour of the continuance of the present system, and in these circumstances it is not proposed to take steps for the repeal of the section.

Irish Boards of Guardians and Tenders for Supplies.

Mr. MEAGHER: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in considering contracts for the supplies for workhouses and dispensaries, boards of guardians are allowed to use their discretion to accept any tender which they decide on, irrespective as to whether the same may be the lowest or not, if, in their opinion, or in the opinion of the majority of the board, they are doing the best for the interests of the ratepayers; and whether it is only in the case of district council work that reasons are to be given to the Local Government Board as to why tenders other than the lowest were accepted.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) Boards of guardians are, in the exercise of their discretion, at liberty to accept the lowest or any tender for the supply of goods to the workhouse, except in the case of medicines and medical and surgical appliances. In order to obtain recoupment from the local taxation account of portion of the cost of these latter articles, boards of guardians must, before accepting a tender, other than the lowest, obtain the approval of the Local Government Board. In every case boards of guardians must be prepared to satisfy the auditor that their action in accepting a tender other than the lowest was in the best interest of the ratepayers. Section 18 of The Local Government (Ireland) Act, 1902, requires a rural district council which accepts a tender other than the lowest, for the execution of a public work, to give the reasons on a prescribed form for the non-acceptance of the lower tender or tenders. The reasons must be produced to the auditor of the Local Government Board.

Extra Police at Loughrea.

MR. DUFFY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland how many extra policemen are stationed in Loughrea at present arising out of the eviction of Mr. Martin Ward; how many are employed protecting the men in possession of Mr. Ward's premises; is any share of the cost to be borne by the landlord, Lord Clanricarde; and, if not, who will be responsible.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed by the police authorities that the number of extra policemen at present stationed in Loughrea is eleven. No policemen have been specially detailed for the protection of the caretakers of Mr. Ward's late premises, but this duty is performed by the police generally. The extra policemen at Loughrea belong to the established force of county Galway, and the cost therefore falls on the Parliamentary Vote, and not on local authorities or other persons.

Complaints of the O'Hara Tenants.

MR. DUFFY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what steps have been taken by the Estates Commissioners to investigate the complaint made in the memorial forwarded to them by a body of the O'Hara tenantry, near Gort; and will he state how the matter stands.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have entered into communication with the agent of the estate in question upon the subject of the petition which they have received from the occupiers of small holdings in the district. No proceedings for the sale of the estate have yet been instituted before them.

Changes in the Irish Intermediate Education Programme.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, seeing that the House of Commons unanimously agreed on May 21st,† to certain changes in the intermediate programme for the year 1907, and that these changes created no difficulty in administration, he will explain why the Board took one month before they could give a definite reply to the matter; whether he will secure the publication of the minutes of the meeting of the Board at which this matter was discussed; and will he state which of the proposed changes causes difficulty, and in what way it does so.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) There has been no avoidable delay on the part of the Board or of the Executive in dealing with this matter. Any delay that has occurred has been due to the difficulties inherent in the case, and to the necessity of summoning members of the Board from various parts of Ireland to the meeting convened to consider the matter. It was found necessary to take the opinion of the Law Officers as to the effect of the Resolution of the House upon the rules submitted, and His Excellency was advised that the rules as a whole had been rendered null and void by the passing of the Resolution, and that a new set of rules required to be submitted. This opinion was communicated to the Intermediate Education Board, who thought that, considering the difficulties and intricacy of the matter, they could not, within the time necessary to enable rules to become effective, frame new rules which would adequately meet the case. They have therefore submitted the rules already approved of for 1906 as rules for 1907, and these, with the formal sanction of the Lord-Lieutenant, have now been laid on the Table. The publication of the minutes of the Board would be very unusual and, in the opinion of the Government, not to the public interest, nor has the Irish Government any power to require the Board to produce the minutes of its proceedings. Even if I possessed the necessary technical acquaintance with the subject it would be impossible within the limits of an Answer to explain the difficulties which have led the Board, as they inform me, to postpone for the present year an attempt to reconstruct these rules.

Turbary on Lord Orkney's Estate at Castle Iney.

Mr. KENDAL O'BRIEN (Tipperary, Mid.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the tenants on Lord Orkney's estate, at Castle Iney, county Tipperary, signed their purchase agreements on the understanding that the turbary was to be divided equally amongst them, and that the solicitor acting for the tenants, Mr. Ryan, received a letter from the solicitor for the landlord, Mr. Lyster, previous to the signing of agreements, stating that the turbary was to be sold to the Estates Commissioners for the purpose mentioned, and will he say if this turbary has been acquired by the Estates Commissioners, is it to be distributed evenly amongst the purchasing tenants, and what steps have been taken since the negotiations were completed in 1904 to distribute this portion of the estate amongst the tenants.

Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that proceedings for the sale of this estate are before them, but that the property has not yet been inspected on their behalf. The matters of fact alleged in the Question will be inquired into when the inspection is being made, but the Commissioners have no present knowledge on the subject. No part of the property has been acquired by the Estates Commissioners.

Report of the Estates and Land Commissioners.

Mr. P. A. McHUGH (Sligo, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Report of the Estates Commissioners for the year ended March 31st, 1906, has yet been issued; if not, can he say when it is likely to be available for Members; and can he say when the Land Commission Report for the same year will be issued.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that they anticipate that their Report will be ready for presentation by the middle of next month, and the Land Commission that their annual Report will be completed by about the same time. Such delay as has occurred in completing the Report of the Estates Commissioners is, they inform me, largely due to the diversion of much of the time of their staff to the preparation of Answers to Questions put in this House. My recollection, however, is that this does not, however, in any way refer to Questions put by the hon. Member, whose Questions have not, according to my recollection, unduly occupied the time of the Commissioners or of any Irish Department.

Grant towards Improvement of Kinvarra Harbour.

Mr. DUFFY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to a Resolution passed by the Galway County Council at its meeting on the 18th instant, wherein disapproval is expressed of the action of the Department of Agriculture in withholding the payment of their promised contribution of £1,100 towards the improvement of Kinvarra Harbour; and whether, in view of the necessity of completing the improvements to the harbour and the extension of the pier, he will take steps to see that the undertaking arrived at, as between the county council and the Department of Agriculture, is carried out with the least possible delay.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Resolution referred to has been received. The proposed harbour works at Kinvarra are in two sections. In one of these, the cost of which is £1,900, the works are already in progress under the Marine Works Act, £1,100 having been provided under that Act, and £800 by the county council. The other scheme, which involves a cost of £1,600, consists of an extension proposed by the county council to which the Department of Agriculture proposes to contribute £1,100. The Department have no desire to withdraw their offered contribution, but a legal difficulty has arisen as to the powers of the county council to contribute their share of the cost. This matter is, at present, receiving the earnest attention of the Government.

South Derby Election—Assault Case.

Mr. FLYNN (Cork, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the proceedings in the case of George M'Cullough and William Foster, in connection with the South Derry election, to recover damages for assault and battery, tried in Dublin before Justice Kenny and a jury, and in which plaintiff obtained a verdict for £20 damages; is he aware that the learned judge commented strongly on the conduct of the local police in not prosecuting Foster for this assault; and will he say what steps do the constabulary authorities intend to take in regard to Constable Mason and the other policemen.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) My attention had not been called to this case, but I have now received a report from the police authorities and have seen a newspaper report containing the comments of the learned judge upon the hearing of the civil action. It appears that the assault in question was witnessed by two policemen, who at once interfered to prevent further assaults. I am informed that it is not the practice for the police to prosecute in such cases unless the assault is of a serious nature or is one involving the general peace of the locality; and if the police have any doubt upon the latter point, they take the directions of the magistrates at petty sessions, under 25 and 26 Vic. Cap. 50, Sec. 9. This was done in the present case, and the bench of magistrates decided that, as a civil action was pending, it was better that the police should not interfere. Mr. M'Cullough himself had requested the police not to prosecute, as he intended to take a civil action. The learned judge was probably not informed of this fact. As the police followed the usual course in this case, the Inspector-General does not intend to take any steps.

Belfast Prison Governor.

MR. McKILLOP (Armagh, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland can he state what is the age of the present governor of the Belfast prison; how long has he been in the service, and does the sixty-five rule apply to his case; can he say how many prisons he has been governor in before his appointment to Belfast; and how many escapes and attempted escapes have taken place in each, during the term of his governorship.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed that the Governor of Belfast prison is sixty-one years of age. He has been in the prison service for forty years. The rule as to retirement at sixty-five does not apply in his case, as he is one of the existing officers who were transferred to the service of the general Prisons Board under the Prisons Act of 1877. He has been governor of three prisons besides Belfast, namely, Tralee, Limerick, and Clonmel. One escape and one attempted escape occurred during his governorship of Tralee prison, and one escape during his governorship of Limerick Prison.

Belfast Prison—Confidential Reports.

MR. McKILLOP: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is usual for the Prisons Board, in regard to charges against warders, to receive secret Reports from the governors of prisons in such cases; if not, is he aware of any cases in which such has been done; whether the Prisons Board ever consider or base their decision on such Reports, without disclosing the nature of the same to the warder concerned; and whether any such secret Reports have been received from the Governor of Belfast prison during the past twelve months; and, if so, will such be laid upon the Table of the House.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The General Prisons Board inform me that they continuously receive from prison governors, including the Governor of Belfast Prison, confidential reports upon matters affecting prison administration and discipline. Warders are afforded full opportunity of meeting any charges which may be brought against them. The evidence in support of the charges is taken in their presence, and they may cross-examine the witnesses and bring up witnesses in their own defence. The General Prison Board do not, in any such case, base their decision on confidential reports, but on the admitted or proved facts of the case. It would be quite contrary to the established practice, and not in the interests of the public service, to lay upon the Table confidential reports received by the Prisons Board from their officers.

Glenties Land Dispute.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the proceedings of the landlord in a case in which the Marquess Conygham is plaintiff and Major Johnstone, of New Eden, Glenties, in the county of Donegal, is defendant, in which, at the last petty sessions at Ardara, on 12th June, a decree for the possession of three farms, Magherymore, Mullynigh, and Oisk, all under one rental, was granted, a decree in ejectment for non-payment of rent having been previously obtained, and to the magistrate's opinion that the application could not be refused as the six months' period of redemption had expired, notwithstanding that the defendant made an offer in gold of full rent and costs, which was refused, although Captain Crosbie, the resident magistrate, strongly urged its acceptance by the landlord's solicitor; and whether, having regard to the fact that the decree for possession was given on an undertaking on behalf of the landlord that the eviction would not be carried out for a month, and that now, in violation of that undertaking, preparations are being made for its immediate execution, he will refuse to lend the forces of the Crown in this case.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed that the facts are substantially as stated in the Question. The decree which was granted was, however, not against Major Johnstone but against James Boyle, who was originally a subtenant to Major Johnstone, and was, at the date of the decree, caretaker of the holdings. It is, I understand, the fact that the resident magistrate suggested the acceptance of the proposed payment in the interests of peace, but the plaintiff's solicitor stated that he had no power to accept the offer. I have no information as to any undertaking that the execution of the decree should be delayed for a month, nor have I any information that preparations for its execution are now being made; but in any event, it is hardly necessary for me to remind the hon. and learned Member that I have no power whatever to withhold the forces of the Crown in cases of this kind.

Clonamirin Estate Sale.

MR. DUFFY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the proposed sale of a large estate, situated in Clonamirin, Mount Shannon, county Galway, in sections, to four or five tenants; whether he is aware that close on forty small tenancies, of an average valuation of less than £5, exist in the neighbourhood; and whether the Estates Commissioners will institute special inquiry into the circumstances attending the sale of the John F. George and James Wakely estate before sanctioning a sale which, if carried out, will stereotype the poverty of the congested occupiers in the district.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that in the short time since notice of this Question was given they have been unable to trace any proceedings as having been instituted before them in respect of the estate referred to, but they will have a further investigation made, and I will apprise the hon. Member of the result.

Belfast Army Meat Supplies.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that dissatisfaction has been expressed respecting the quality of the meat supplied to the troops stationed in Belfast; and whether he can state the firm to whom the contract was given.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) No complaint has reached the War Office regarding the quality of meat supplied under the Belfast contract, which is held by F. Boddy, of Liverpool.

Royal Small Arms Factory, Birmingham

MR. C. DUNCAN (Barrow-in-Furness): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can state how many of the men recently employed at the Royal Small Arms Factory, Birmingham, have been thrown out of employment owing to the transference of this factory to a private company; and whether, in view of the understanding that no man should be discharged, and the promise given by the Government that 25 per cent. of the orders to be given out to private contractors should be sent to this factory, he will say what action the Government intend to take in order to prevent the discharge of the workmen.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The condition of transfer alluded to was that preference of employment by the purchasing company was to be given to men employed by the Government at the factory at the time of transfer. We understand that this condition of the agreement is being fulfilled, and that all men who were so employed at that date are still employed at the factory.

Crimean Veteran's Record.

MR. MURPHY (Kerry, E.): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the prosecution, at Killarney, on the 18th June, 1906, of Cornelius Brosnihan for begging; whether he is aware that this man was a soldier in the 32nd Regiment, and served through the Crimean War and Indian Mutiny, and was also presented with the medal of the Royal Humane Society for life-saving; and whether he can do anything to relieve this distressed old soldier and save him from poverty in his old age.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) This man was discharged from the Army with ignominy, and with a very bad character. This is not considered to be a case deserving a compassionate allowance.

Natal Natives and the Kimberley Mines.

MR. J. RAMSAY MACDONALD (Leicester): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Natal natives captured as rebels are being sentenced and sent to work in the Kimberley mines; whether he would inform the House what are the terms of contract which the Natal Government has made with the De Beers Company in respect to these rebels; and whether His Majesty's Government propose to make any representation to the Natal Government on the subject.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) I can add nothing to my previous Answers upon this subject except that I am confident that there is no contract in existence of the kind suggested, and that we have telegraphed to ask for information as to the facts.

Transvaal Trade Routes.

MR. MOLTENO (Dumfriesshire): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies what have been the respective proportions of the trade of the Transvaal, in tonnage, carried via the ports of the Cape, Natal, and Delagoa Bay, respectively, in each year since the modus vivendi came into force; what was the proportion carried via the same ports in the last complete year before the war; and whether he is aware that the trade of the ports of the Cape and Natal is languishing, while the port of Delagoa Bay is stated to be so congested that the warehouses are all full, and goods are being stored in the open.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The hon. Member's Question is understood to refer to commercial sea-borne traffic imported through the coast ports to the Transvaal. Statistics, either before the war or later, enabling a full Answer to be given are not available, but it would appear that this traffic during the period December, 1903, to May, 1905, was divided in the proportion of about 44 per cent. to Delagoa Bay, 40 per cent. to Natal, and 16 per cent. to the Cape. I have no official information to the effect of the last part of the Question.

Australian Tinned Meats.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that, owing to the system of inspection of cattle before slaughter in Australia, there has been no complaint in reference to Australian tinned meats; and whether this will be borne in mind by the Government in view of the necessity which may arise for the purchase of tinned provisions.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) I understand that there is a very careful inspection of cattle before slaughter in the various States of Australia and in New Zealand, and I am not aware that any complaint has been made in regard to tinned meat imported from those Colonies. Very little, if any, tinned meat is imported at present from Australia, but as regards the imports from New Zealand, the Secretary of State recently, at the request of the Colonial Government, drew the attention of the various Government Departments concerned in the matter to the fact that all frozen and tinned meats sent from that Colony are subject to minute inspection under stringent conditions carried out by duly qualified inspectors.

Russian Treatment of Jews.

MR. STRAUS (Tower Hamlets, Mile End): To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can give the House any information on the unsettled state of affairs in Russia; and whether he could consult the French and German Ambassadors in reference to sending a joint note protesting against the treatment of the Jews in Russia on humanitarian, not religious, grounds.

(Answered by Secretary Sir Edward Grey.) The Answer to both Questions is in the negative. For reasons which have already been given, His Majesty's Government cannot adopt the course advocated.

Solvency of Insurance Companies.

MR. FIELD: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, whether he will consider the advisability of establishing an Insurance State Department with Government auditors to investigate and report on the solvency of all British, Colonial, American, and foreign insurance companies transacting business in the United Kingdom.

(Answered by Mr. Kearley.) As at present advised, I have no intention of introducing legislation of the nature suggested. Certain questions affecting the interests of British policy-holders in foreign and Colonial life insurance companies transacting business in the United Kingdom are now being considered by a Committee of the House of Lords.

Dingwall and Cromarty Light Railway.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will state what progress has been made with the Dingwall and Cromarty Light Railway?

(Answered by Mr. Kearley.) I have again communicated with both the railway companies concerned in this matter, and I am informed that since the date of my hon. friend's previous Question of the 29th March last,† the working survey of the line has proceeded continuously.

Blasting Accidents in the Channel Islands.

MR. KEIR HARDIE (Merthyr Tydvil) To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can state the number of accidents due to blasting and other operations during the past five years in the Channel Islands; and what inquiries are instituted when such accidents have a fatal termination?

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) I have communicated with the Lieutenant Governors of Jersey and Guernsey, and have received the following information:—No accident due to blasting, either fatal or non-fatal, is known to have occurred in Jersey during the past five years. If such an accident happened and had a fatal termination, proceedings termed "Levées de corps," which correspond to a coroner's inquest, would immediately be held by the "vicomte" on a warrant issued by the bailiff. In Guernsey and Alderney there have been, respectively, five and three fatal accidents during the same period. No official record is kept of blasting accidents which do not end fatally. In the case of a fatal accident, an inquest is held in Guernsey by the Royal Court under the presidency of the bailiff, in Alderney by the Court of Alderney, under the presidency of the judge.

Cabman's Licence Suspension.

MR. STEADMAN (Finsbury, Central): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the case of a cabman who, on the 15th of May, was arrested for being drunk in the Harrow Road at 12.30 a.m., and was fined on the next morning 4s. or four days, at the Marylebone Police Court, and to the fact that during the hearing it came out that he was a cab driver, badge 16,872, and that his licence expired on the 14th of June, and that when he applied for its renewal he was told that it would be suspended for two years; and, if so, will he say under what Act or regulation the Chief Commissioner took this action; and whether, as the man was not driving or in charge of a cab at the time of his arrest, he will take steps to see that the man's licence is renewed as soon as possible.

† See (4) Debates, cliv., 1542.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) Yes, Sir. The driver in question is a man of intemperate habits. It was after his fifth conviction, and after repeated warnings, that his licence was refused him. It will not again be granted except upon proof that he has become a sober man. The action of the Commissioner of Police was taken under the London Hackney Carriages Act, 1843, Section 8, and this exercise of his power, has been upheld by the High Court (see 28 J.P. 438). I see no ground whatever for interfering with the Commissioner's discretion.

H.M.S. "Renown."

Mr. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the first class battleship "Renown," which has for some months been without an important part of her fighting equipment, has now had her guns and ammunition returned to her; whether he can state for how long the first class battleship "Ramillies" will be in dockyard hands owing to the recent collision; and also afford similar information about the first class battleship "Prince of Wales," which was brought home on account of the breakdown of her main engines.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) The portion of the secondary armament of the "Renown," alluded to, is ready for shipment at short notice. The other portions of the Question cannot be answered, as the times of completion have not yet been reported.

Admiralty Clerks.

Mr. J. M. ROBERTSON (Northumberland, Tyneside): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether, in view of the fact that all of the redundant second division clerks now serving in the Admiralty have served in that department for periods varying from nearly four to seven and a half years, and of the effect upon their position of transfer to other offices, he will arrange that no further transfer shall take place, and that all the clerks in question shall be absorbed into the establishment as opportunity occurs.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) By Clause 11 of the Order in Council, dated 29th November 1898, all redundant clerks are liable to be transferred without reference to their age or the amount of their salary. By Treasury circular, dated 27th August, 1896, No. 12,613, the seniority of a clerk of the second division depends on his length of service in the division as a whole, and not in any particular Department. The question of retaining such of the clerks as have a prospect of being absorbed within a reasonable time will be considered.

New Mall Roadway.

Mr. STEADMAN: To ask the First Commissioner of Works, the cause of the delay in opening up the roadway through the Mall to Charing Cross, in view of the inconvenience caused to the public generally, and more especially to those going Citywards.

(Answered by Mr. Harcourt.) It was decided by the late Government and the last Parliament, that the entrance from the Mall to Charing Cross should be by archways through the new Admiralty block, which is in course of construction. Until this building is completed it will be impossible to open the new roadway.

Campbeltown Mails.

Mr. YOUNGER (Ayr Burghs): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that mails from Machrihanish and Southend reach Campbeltown every morning except Sunday about 7.15; that the local letters for Campbeltown are not delivered till three or four o'clock in the afternoon of the same day, and too late to permit of any reply by the outgoing mail to the places mentioned; whether, as inconvenience is caused by this arrangement, he can grant a morning delivery of these letters in Campbeltown.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I will cause inquiry to be made in regard to the matter, and will inform the hon. Member of the result.

Enniskillen Learner's Pay.

MR. SLOAN: To ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that a qualified male learner at Enniskillen, after being in the service two and a half years, is only in receipt of six shillings per week, whilst another learner, with less service, has been placed on full pay since April last; and whether he will explain the reason for this difference.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I will make inquiry and communicate the result to the hon. Member.

Letter Collections.

MR. PIKE PEASE (Darlington): To ask the Postmaster-General whether the Post Office letter carriers, when proceeding on their rounds collecting letters from the pillar boxes, are precluded by the regulations from accepting letters to be posted from passers by; and if so, whether he will consider the advisability of altering such instructions for the convenience of those of the public who do not reside in the immediate vicinity of a post office or a pillar box, but near the road used by the letter carrier.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) Rural postmen are allowed to collect letters from the public except in the immediate vicinity of a post office or a letter box; but the circumstances in towns are not such as to admit of this facility being given. Collections in towns have to fit closely to the despatches, and to allow the public to hand letters to a postman in a town would be to risk delay in the correspondence generally. Moreover, letter boxes in towns are much nearer together than in rural districts.

Central Telegraph Office Staff.

MR. SEAVERNS (Lambeth, Brixton): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he will state the number of telegraphists attached to the Central Telegraph Office, who are at the present time loaned to the engineer-in-chief's department for the purpose of assisting in clerical and other work.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The number of telegraphists belonging to the Central Telegraph Office who are at present attached to the engineer-in-chief's department for temporary duty is nineteen.

Diocesan Education Inspectors.

MR. PIKE PEASE: To ask the President of the Board of Education whether he can make any statement as to how far the suggested repeal of the Education Act of 1870 would affect the position of diocesan inspectors (Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Board of Education have no relations with diocesan inspectors. The latter are not officials of any education authorities. It is, therefore, impossible for me to say how the position of such persons will be affected, if at all, by the Education Bill, or by the repeal of the few clauses of The Education Act, 1870, that are affected by the Bill.

Poplar Schools at Hutton.

MR. PIKE PEASE: To ask the President of the Board of Education whether he can state the exact amount that has been spent on the Poplar schools at Hutton, Essex, to date; and whether the accommodation provided is for 600 children.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) My right hon. friend has asked me to reply to this Question. The total amount sanctioned in respect of the provision of these schools, including the cost of the site, is £156,545. I am not able to state the exact amount which has been spent on them. The schools are intended to accommodate 624 children.

Port of London—Inspection of Tinned Foods.

MR. H. H. MARKS (Kent, Thanet): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will consider the advisability of taking measures to give effect to the opinion expressed by the Sanitary Committee of the Port of London that tinned articles of food should be subjected to a proper system of inspection before they are exported to the United Kingdom.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I am giving consideration to the measures which should be taken so as to secure the object which the hon. Member has in view.

Admiralty Clerks.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON: To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in view of the fact that authority has been given for the appointment of 151 temporary hired accountant clerks in the Accountant-General's department of the Admiralty, for the performance of duties of a permanent nature, and that the work has previously been performed by established clerks, who have passed competitive and medical examinations and hold Civil Service certificates of competency, he will state what justification exists for this departure from the spirit of the Order in Council of the 4th June, 1870, which established open competition as the general rule for admission to His Majesty's Civil Service.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) As I explained in my Answer given to the hon. Member for the North Division of Camberwell on the 27th March last,† there are justifications of general expediency and precedent for these appointments, and power is given by Clause 8 of the Order in Council in question to withdraw appointments from the list of those filled by open competition.

Customs Inspectors.

MR. H. H. MARKS: To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that on the recent retirement of the inspector of the outdoor department of the Customs in London, an inspector was brought from Liverpool to London, a surveyor was moved from Glasgow to Liverpool, and another surveyor from London to Glasgow, to fill the resulting vacancies, entailing a cost of nearly £1,000; and will he explain why the vacant inspectorship was not filled by a London man, and the resulting vacancies by London men who were entitled to promotion.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) It is the case that a recent vacancy of inspector in London was filled by the transfer of an inspector from Liverpool, but that transfer was at the officer's own request and expense. The resulting vacancy of inspector having been offered to and refused by a London surveyor, was filled by the promotion of a first-class surveyor at Glasgow, and a second-class surveyor in London was promoted to the first-class surveyorship at Glasgow. The cost to the Crown of these two removals is not likely to exceed £100. Vacancies of inspector are filled by the promotion of the most suitable officer from among the general body, irrespective of the particular port at which he may be stationed.

Denatured Alcohol.

MR. MOND (Chester): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the fact that a Bill allowing the use of denatured alcohol, free from revenue tax, in the arts and manufactures was recently passed by the House of Representatives and the Senate House of the United States of America; and whether he will take steps to expedite the passing of the Bill introduced by him on this subject.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) My attention has been called to the United States legislation referred to. I recognise the desirability of making the changes in the law of the United Kingdom, which are proposed in the Revenue Bill, as soon as possible, and I will do what I can to secure the passing of the Bill this year.

Jute Cultivation in Bengal.

MR. MOND: To ask the Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to the increase in the price of jute, owing to the shortage in supply, whereby the price of bags and other products made from jute has been very seriously affected to the detriment of trade in this country; and whether, in view of these circumstances, the Government will take steps to encourage a greater cultivation of jute.

---

† See (4) Debates, cliv., 1075.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) I understand that the shortage is due to a great and rapid increase of demand, as the area under jute and the yield have steadily increased. In the districts of Eastern Bengal in which the plant is grown its cultivation has extended to soils not altogether suitable for it. The improvement of the crop and the introduction of the plant into other parts of India are engaging the careful attention of the Government of India and of local governments, and experiments are in progress. An experienced agricultural chemist has been added as a jute specialist to the staff of the Agricultural Department of Bengal, and action has been taken on his recommendation that cultivation should be tried in the Godaveri delta, in the Madras Presidency, and in other similar tracts.

Bengal and Bombay Civil Service Pension Funds.

MR. HART-DAVIES (Hackney, N.): To ask the Secretary of State for India what were the amounts of the funds transferred to Government when the administration of the Bengal and Bombay Civil Service Provident and Pension Funds was taken over by the Government; and whether a separate account has since been kept of the receipts and disbursements of those funds, or whether they have been merged in the general finances of the Indian Government.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) The balance of the Bengal and Bombay Funds, at the time of their transfer to the Government amounted (at 2s. a rupee) to £1,908,469 and £815,345 respectively. The receipts and disbursements of the funds since the transfer have been merged in the general finances of the Government of India.

Owen Wynne Estate, County Sligo.

MR. P. A. MCHUGH: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in regard to the Owen Wynne Estate, county Sligo, of which the sale was completed on the 8th February, 1906, whether he can state the names and addresses of the tenants whose holdings were excluded from the estate for sale; how many holdings were excluded on the ground that they would not afford security for the advances applied for; were all the holdings, for which advances were made, inspected; can he state in terms of years purchase the average price paid for non-judicial, first term, and second term, rents on the estate sold; whether the Estates Commissioners have considered the confusion likely to result from the exclusion of isolated holdings from the estates within which they are situate, and their subsequent inclusion in estates from which they are separated and whether, in regard to the estates sold, any public notice was given locally of the holdings excluded.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissoners inform me that the holdings of fourteen tenants were excluded from the sale of this estate. I am forwarding to the hon. Member the names and addresses of these tenants. In eight of the cases the advances were refused on the ground of insufficient security. In cases outside the zones the holdings were inspected, but there was no inspection in cases within the zones. The average number of years purchase of the rents was: in the case of non-judicial rents, 24·1; first term rents, 22·8; second term rents, 26·6. The Commissioners do not consider that the exclusion of holdings from the estate in which they are situate and their subsequent inclusion in other estates causes any serious confusion. No public notice as to the excluded holdings was given, but notice was given to the tenants concerned.

Imperial Taxation in Ireland.

MR. FIELD: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the number of the population in Ireland in 1851, and the amount of Imperial taxation levied in that year; whether he can state the estimated number of the population, deducting the number of emigrants since the last census and adding on the births to the 31st May, 1906; and also state the amount of Imperial taxation to be levied in Ireland for the year 1906–7.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) According to the census of 1851, the population of Ireland in that year was 6,574,278. I have been unable to ascertain the amount of the Imperial taxation levied in Ireland in 1851, but the amount for 1849, the nearest year for which figures are available, was £4,563,512. Present estimates of population are made quarterly, and the estimated population on the 31st March, 1906, was 4,397,720. The estimated amount of Imperial taxation to be levied in 1906–7 is £8,339,000.

Ardrum Evicted Tenant.

MR. SHEEHAN (Cork County, Mid.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, whether the Estates Commissioners have received a statement of claim for re-instatement from Patrick Mullane, an evicted tenant on the Colthurst Estate, at Ardrum, Inniscarra, county Cork; is the evicted farm at present occupied by a planter named John Buttimer; has he been approached with a view to giving up possession to the evicted tenant; have any negotiations taken place for the sale of this estate; and what steps will be taken in regard to Mullane's claim for re-instatement.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners have received from Patrick Mullane an application for re-instatement, and the matter has been referred to an inspector for inquiry. Pending the receipt of the inspector's report the Commissioners have no information as to the facts of the case.

Irish Teachers.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the number of teachers trained in Irish elementary training colleges who have left Ireland for Great Britain from the beginning of 1900 to the end of 1905, together with the names of the colleges in which they were trained (indicating the number trained in each college); whether he can assign any reason for the departure of those teachers from Ireland; and whether he can also state the total amount expended on the training of those teachers, and say whether the sum so expended has been lost to elementary education in Ireland.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Commissioners of National Education inform me that, so far as can be ascertained from their records, the number of teachers trained in Irish elementary training colleges who have left Ireland for Great Britain from the beginning of 1900 to the end of 1905 is 242. The numbers trained in the different training colleges were:—Marlborough Street, 118; St. Patrick's, Drumconda, 18; Our Lady of Mercy, Baggot Street, and Blackrock, 15; Church of Ireland, 29; De la Salle, Waterford, 29; St. Mary's, Belfast, 16; Mary Immaculate, Limerick; 17. The records do not, however, purport to account for all cases, particularly as some teachers who were trained in Ireland and who went to Great Britain directly after their training, have not yet furnished returns of their destinations, and in such cases no information is available. The Commissioners have not sufficient data to enable them to assign a definite cause for the departure of those teachers. The total amount expended on the training of the teachers referred to was about £20,000, including diploma bonuses. It is not possible to say to what extent the sum so expended is lost to elementary education in Ireland, for not only have most of these teachers given service after their training and before leaving for Great Britain in Irish national schools, but many Irish trained teachers, after spending some time in Great Britain, have returned to Ireland and resumed service as national teachers. During the year 1905, twenty-two teachers who had gone to schools in Great Britain returned to Ireland and are again teaching in national schools.

Killaloe Petty Sessions Clerk.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the fact that he was elected to the position by the majority of the magistrates, the Local Government Board will sanction the appointment of Mr. M'Keogh as petty sessions clerk of Killaloe.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) It has been ascertained that Mr. M'Keogh did not receive a majority of valid votes of the magistrates, and the Lord-Lieutenant has therefore been unable to approve of the election. It will be necessary to hold a fresh election Belfast Police Inquiry—Head Constable Farrell.

Mr. SLOAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Constable Shankey, of Leopold Street Barrack, Belfast, made and signed a statement regarding the charges then pending against Head Constable Farrell, and subsequently at the police inquiry, held in connection with these charges, contradicted his former statement; and if, under these circumstancs, he will explain why Constable Shankey was allowed to remain in Belfast; and whether Constable Bradley acted similarly in connection with this case, and, if not, why was he transferred.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Inspector-General informs me that the sworn evidence given by Constable Shankey was in complete accord with his prior written statement of the main point at issue, though there was some variation in regard to details. The Inspector-General saw no reason for ordering the constable's removal from Belfast. Constable Bradley did not act similarly; the reasons for this constable's removal were stated in my reply to a Question put by the hon. Member for South Down on 1st May,† to which I beg to refer the hon. Member.

Housing of Working Classes—Boyle Commissioners' Resolution.

Mr. JAMES O'KELLY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been drawn to a resolution passed by the Boyle Town Commissioners to the effect that, having built houses and added plots of land for workers, under the Housing of the Working Classes Acts, they are anxious to sell the same to the occupiers, who have paid their rents punctually for five years, on the lines proposed by the Government in the new Labourers' Bill, and asking the Government to so amend the Bill as to apply this provision to houses and plots provided under the Housing of the Working Classes Acts in small towns, and thus give the workers a freehold in their own land, and liberate funds for further building operations in relief of this class in the Irish towns; and whether he proposes to take any action in connection with the matter.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I beg to refer to my Answers to Questions on this subject put by the hon. Members for East Clare and West Kerry on Tuesday and Thursday last,‡ which have probably escaped the hon. Member's notice.

Irish Taxation.

Mr. MURPHY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland why the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction presented the Return of local contributions out of the rates to Parliament, without stating the total amount of such contributions for the entire country as well as setting them out in detail; whether he can give the total of such contributions for the years dealt with, and also state the amount of all the grants received from other sources by the Department for each of the years mentioned, and the full total of all moneys received by the Department from all sources since its establishment.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Return in question gives the particulars required by the Order of the House. The totals for each county were not demanded, but they may be readily ascertained from the Return. The totals of the figures given in detail in the Return are as follows:—

Year.	Amount.
1900–1 - - -	9,642	12	8
1901–2 - - -	41,201	2	2
1902–3 - - -	45,755	19	8
1903–4 - - -	49,822	13	7
1904–5 - - -	53,259	7	10
1905–6 - - -	53,057	12	11
Gross total for the six years - -	£252,739	8	10

These sums are not grants received by the Department, but are the amounts levied by the local authorities from the rates, and expended locally in carrying out the approved schemes under The Agriculture and Technical Instruction (Ireland) Act, 1899, which are also subsidised by the Department. In reply to the concluding inquiry, I beg to refer the hon. Member to the Appropriation Accounts annually laid before Parliament, which contain statements of all moneys received by the Department each year.

Italian International Congress.

MR. FIELD: To ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government will make inquiries as to the advisability of sending delegates to assist at the Italian International Congress, with a view to co-operate with other nations in an international endeavour to prevent gambling in futures, options, foodstuffs, cotton, shares, and warrants.

(Answered by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.) I have nothing to add to the Answer which I gave to the hon. Member on 3rd April.†

South African Mining Shares.

MR. FIELD: To ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the fact that the depreciation in South African mining and other shares, amounting in 1905–6 to over £100,000,000, has been due to an organised bear raid on the London, Paris, and Johannesburg Stock Exchanges, and that according to the South African preferences the mining magnates are endeavouring to explain this state of affairs by laying the blame for the collapse on the conduct of the Imperial Government; and, in consideration of the effect of such losses on the economic position of South Africa and the values of funds and other securities, and of the fact that a syndicate has been formed in order to protect the diamond mine shares against similar bear raids, His Majesty's Government intend to take any measures to stop a continuance of these systems of bull and bear financial gambling operations in fictitious shares, with the object of protecting the interests of bona fide shareholders.

(Answered by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.) I have no information on this Question, but, assuming the facts to be as stated, I am doubtful if any effectual measure could be adopted by the Government in the interest of the shareholders.

Political Pensions.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): To ask the Prime Minister if the Government has any objection to the Bill for the abolition of The Political Pensions Act, 1869.

(Answered by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.) My attention has only been directed to this Bill by the hon. and gallant Member's Question, and I have not had an opportunity of consulting my colleagues. It would assist them in coming to a conclusion if the hon. and gallant Gentleman would tell me whether the intention of the Bill is merely to stop the issue of fresh pensions, or at the same time to cancel those already granted.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Naval Officers' Eyesight.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether, with a view to the safety of His Majesty's ships and their crews, the Admiralty hold the Commander-in-Chief of a station responsible that cases of defective vision on the part of officers commanding ships are reported to the Admiralty; and whether the officer commanding a ship is in a similar manner held responsible in the case of his officers.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON, Dundee): It is naturally the duty of Commanders-in-Chief and Commanding Officers of ships to report any circumstances affecting the capacity of an officer to perform the duties for which he is responsible, but it has not been considered necessary to specify any particular defect as calling for a special report.

MR. BELLAIRS: Have the Admiralty received any report at all with reference to H.M.S. "Montagu?"

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON asked for notice of the Question.

Army Rations—Preserved Foods.

Mr. LEA (St. Pancras, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the fact that boards of guardians all over the country are declining to issue tinned meat to inmates of our workhouses, he will reconsider his refusal to forbid any further issue of preserved food as Army rations to our soldiers in time of peace.

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the WAR OFFICE (Mr. Buchanan, Perthshire, E.): Orders have been given to withhold all issues of American brands of preserved meat until the officer dispatched to America to inquire into their character has reported.

Mr. LEA: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will permit tins of the preserved food issued to our soldiers from the store in reserve for war purposes, and which are several years old, to be placed in the tea-room of the House of Commons, and allow these tins to be opened so that hon. Members can see the character of the food that has been issued to the Army.

Mr. BUCHANAN: As I have already informed the hon. Member, the issue of American preserved meat is suspended pending the report of our officer, and the Secretary of State thinks it would not be desirable to have the exhibition of tins in the tea-room suggested by the hon. Member.

Mr. LEA: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether any non-commissioned officers or men have been punished during the last three months for refusing to eat tinned meat served out as rations by the military authorities?

Mr. BUCHANAN: I am not aware of any such case.

Dangerous Ammunition.

*Sir ROBERT HOBART (Hampshire, New Forest): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has received any report of an accident which occurred a few days ago at Pirbright to a young officer, who was shot through the stomach; whether, owing to the similarity of the long blank ammunition and the service ammunition, he has received reports that bullets have been frequently heard overhead at sham fights, with danger to onlookers at royal and other reviews; and whether he will consider the advisability of a return to the short blank ammunition under these circumstances.

Mr. BUCHANAN: No details of this accident have as yet been received at the War Office from the General Officer Commanding-in-Chief, Aldershot. It has been decided that for manœuvres and field training short blank ammunition only will be used, the long blank being reserved for instructional purposes.

*Sir ROBERT HOBART: May I ask whether the hon. Gentleman is aware that the possibility of stray bullets on field days has made such an impression on the troops that officers have now less trouble in instructing their men in the art of taking cover?

Mr. BUCHANAN: It is with a view to obviate these and other disadvantages which have arisen that this general order has been issued.

British Officers for the Indian Native Army.

*Mr. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the evidence Lord Roberts gave before the South African War Commission, any action has been taken or is contemplated in order to the provision of a sufficient number of British officers for native regiments in the Indian Army in time of war.

Mr. BUCHANAN: An Inter-Departmental Committee which assembled in April last to inquire into the sources of supply of officers for the Indian Army has quite recently issued its Report. This Report is now being considered.

Payment of Soldiers in the Field.

Captain CRAIG (Down, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether advantage has been taken of experience gained during the late South African campaign to devise a scheme for the payment of men in the field, which will relieve captains of companies from much of the clerical work attendant thereupon, and thus insure that combatant officers will be more free to attend to their executive duties.

MR. BUCHANAN: Yes, Sir. A scheme to this effect has been devised. It is based on the experience gained during the South African campaign.

Army Meat and Foreign Contracts.

MR. McVEIGH (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to a resolution, passed on June 11th by the county council of Donegal, protesting against the change made in the Army meat tender which permits contractors to supply foreign meat killed at the port of disembarkation instead of home-reared meat, which was guaranteed to be used by the late Government some years ago; and will he say whether the Army horses are mainly fed on foreign oats, straw, and hay, and, if so, will he reconsider his decision in the interest of the agriculturist, ratepayers, taxpayers, labourers, and employers of the three kingdoms.

MR. BUCHANAN: My attention has been drawn to this resolution. There is no doubt that considerable quantities of foreign oats and straw are supplied to the Army under contracts, but in the case of oats it would be very difficult to obtain sufficient home grown supplies at reasonable prices. The proposal to limit the supply of forage to British produce would involve an extra expense to the State which I am not prepared to recommend.

South African War—Issues of Firearms to Natives.

MR. BELLOC (Salford, S.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies what was the total number of firearms issued to natives in the course of the South African War; and what was the total number of firearms so issued which have, since the peace, been accounted for as returned.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. CHURCHILL, Manchester, N.W.): The Secretary of State has made inquiry of the War Office upon this question, but the records kept by that Department during the Boer War do not appear to have been so extensive and precise upon this subject as upon other matters, and Lord Elgin has not been able to procure the information which the hon. Member desires.

Natal Court-Martial.

MR. J. RAMSAY MACDONALD (Leicester): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can now state if the report of the proceedings of the court-martial which sentenced twelve Natal natives to death is to be laid upon the Table of the House; and whether he can state how many courts-martial are now sitting in Natal, and how many persons are awaiting trial by them.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Secretary of State has received the following telegram from His Excellency the Governor of Natal. Begins, "I have received following minute from Ministers:—Begins. In consequence of request from Ministers, Press in Natal have, in view of disturbed condition of native mind, refrained from publishing evidence in martial law cases, and Ministers would deprecate publication in England as serving no useful purpose. Ministers, however, have no wish to conceal any of the proceedings, and rather than any such charge should be made against them they would be prepared to agree to publication if His Majesty's Government still consider it necessary." In these circumstances, His Majesty's Government do not, as at present advised, propose to publish the evidence in question; but I should be prepared to give my hon. friend access to it if he so desires. The Secretary of State is not able to state how many courts-martial are now sitting in Natal and how many persons are awaiting trial; but he will inquire.

MR. MYER (Lambeth, N.): May I ask whether there is or was any evidence?

MR. CHURCHILL: Yes, Sir. The evidence is extensive and voluminous, and from what I have seen I am of opinion that it shows the careful and thorough manner in which the trial was conducted.

The "Standard and Diggers News."

*MR. SCOTT (Ashton-under-Lyne): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that the premises, plant, and materials of Messrs. Mendelssohn and Bruce, late proprietors of the Standard and Diggers News, of Johannesburg, were, during the South African War, taken possession of by the British military authorities, and used by these authorities for their own purposes for a period of twenty months; that the accounts of the business during this period, as vouched for by the Auditor-General at Pretoria, and subsequently audited by Messrs. Turquand, Young, and Co., of London, show a profit of £24,855 15s. 4d.; that the late Colonial Secretary, in a letter dated March, 1905, stated that Messrs. Mendelssohn and Bruce were entitled to receive a refund of the profits actually made by the military authorities out of the business carried on in the firms' premises, and through the use of their plant and materials; and will he explain why His Majesty's Government have now offered Messrs. Mendelssohn and Bruce the sum of £2,500 conditionally upon receiving from them a receipt in full discharge of all liability.

Mr. CHURCHILL: There were two premises of Messrs. Mendelssohn and Bruce used for nineteen and sixteen months respectively; the account quoted is subject to certain adjustments, and it is not admitted that the profits shown can be finally treated as actual profits. It is the fact that Mr. Lyttelton acqainted Messrs. Mendelssohn and Bruce in March, 1905, that he considered that they were entitled to the profits made, but they were subsequently informed by Mr. Lyttelton through Sir John Puleston, who had interested himself in the case, that Lord Selborne had very carefully gone into the matter and had come to the conclusion that the proper course was to pay a reasonable rental for their premises as had been done in certain other cases. Messrs. Mendelssohn and Bruce themselves made their original claim, which was for £9,525, on the basis of rent and not of profits. The offer of £2,500 has been made as the result of a careful investigation by an independent expert as to what would be a fair and reasonable payment in respect of the use of the company's premises and plant by the Transvaal authorities. It is admitted that at first there was some confusion in dealing with the matter locally, and that regrettable delay has arisen thereby.

*Mr. SCOTT: Do I understand that £2,500 was offered to cover rent and the use of plant valued at £20,000? One of these premises let at £300 a month.

Mr. CHURCHILL said the premises were not let at £300 a month during the first month of the military occupation, nor could the profits of a newspaper conducted by the military authorities be balanced against the profits which might be made by a commercial company conducting a newspaper not during a period of war.

Mr. PAUL (Northampton) asked whether Messrs. Mendelssohn and Bruce had refused an offer of £80,000 for the Standard and Diggers News from the mineowners on the Rand, who wanted to use it for their own purposes.

Mr. CHURCHILL: A great many people lost a great deal of money in the South African War.

In reply to Mr. LEHMANN (Leicestershire, Market Harborough)—

Mr. CHURCHILL said it was true that the late Secretary of State considered that a fair basis would be the basis of profits; but on further consideration he came to the conclusion it would not be a fair basis.

The Repatriation Proclamation.

Mr. MACKARNESS (Berkshire, Newbury): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether instructions were given by the Secretary of State to the Governor of the Transvaal to issue to the Chinese in the Rand the Repatriation Proclamation which was read to the House of Commons; and, if so, whether those instructions were complied with.

Mr. CHURCHILL: The Secretary of State has received the following telegram from Lord Selborne:—"23rd June A. Matter most urgent. Your telegram of 22nd June No. 1. The terms of His Majesty's Government's offer were first formulated in English. They were then translated into Chinese. Owing to difference between the genius of the two languages, the Chinese text was then translated back into English in order that the ipsissima verba of what the coolies would have placed before them should be submitted to you. This text was cabled in my telegram A 28th April. Words at the end usually rendered in English 'tremblingly obey' constitute stereotyped, formula attached to every single official proclamation issued in China. It is as much part of the literature of Chinese proclamation as the Royal Arms are part of an official proclamation in England, and was therefore no more telegraphed to His Majesty's Government than were the dates in two styles or the official title of the issuer. This is Superintendent of Foreign Labour's explanation to me of the words 'tremblingly obey' as I personally did not know that they were in the proclamation. So much were they a matter of course to a diplomatist of twenty years experience in China that he never even thought of mentioning them to me. I have the most profound confidence in the loyalty of Superintendent of Foreign Labour."

Mr. MACKARNESS: Do the words "tremblingly obey" still form part of the proclamation?

Mr. CHURCHILL: We are considering the desirability of making alterations and amendments in the proclamation.

Sir H. COTTON (Nottingham, E.) asked whether the words "tremblingly obey" were only used in China in prohibitive proclamations, and not in proclamations purporting to make concessions.

Mr. CHURCHILL: The hon. Member speaks with immense and exceptional authority on these questions, and I think it is quite possible that what he says is correct. Speaking for myself, I should say that no commands should be addressed to law-abiding citizens which they cannot obey without trepidation.

Mr. GOOCH (Bath): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he has ascertained whether the translation which has recently appeared of the Repatriation Proclamation is a correct translation of the proclamation as it was posted in the compounds; and, if so, why a different version was read to the House of Commons.

Mr. CHURCHILL: The Foreign Office translator has now reported that the version of the proclamation given in Lord Selborne's telegram of April 28th is a more accurate translation than that which appeared in the Manchester Guardian.

Mr. CLEMENT EDWARDS (Denbigh District): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the original Chinese Repatriation Proclamation was drawn by the Transvaal Chamber of Mines, or one of its officials or members; whether it was submitted to the Secretary of State, before being issued, and approved by him; and whether, when issued, it was posted in the compounds accompanied by the English version read by the Under-Secretary of State to the House of Commons, and by whom was the translation made.

Mr. CHURCHILL: With regard to the first part of the hon. Member's Question, the Secretary of State is informed that the proclamation was drafted by the Superintendent of Foreign Labour. The Answer to the second part of the Question is in the affirmative, and to the third, that he has no reason to suppose that the Chinese version of the proclamation was accompanied by the English version, which would have been unintelligible to those to whom it was addressed. The Superintendent of Foreign Labour made the translation.

Mr. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs) asked if an independent translation would be made.

Mr. CHURCHILL: I have already said we are considering the issue of an amended proclamation.

Mr. MYER asked who was referred to as "we."

Mr. CHURCHILL: When the word "we" is used in answer to Questions it means His Majesty's Government.

Ceylon Pearl Fisheries.

*Sir J. JARDINE (Roxburghshire): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies on what principle of calculation the annual rent of the Ceylon Government Pearl Fisheries was fixed in the lease negotiated with the Ceylon Company of Pearl Fishers at £20,666, when the net profit of the year 1905 accruing to the Ceylon Government was £150,000; whether, before the amount of annual rent was agreed upon with the Gulf Syndicate or the Ceylon Company of Pearl Fishers, the opinions of other Professor Herdmann or Mr. Hornell was asked or taken about the adequacy of this rent; whether Professor Herdmann was employed under Sir J. W. Ridgeway, when Governor of Ceylon, as an expert and scientific adviser on the improvement of these fisheries; and whether either Professor Herdmann or the colonial marine biologist, Mr. Hornell, sent him reports in regard to the improvement of the fisheries and the probable profits of future years.

MR. CHURCHILL: As the hon. Member will find stated on pages 12, 19, and 39 of Cd. 2906, the rental was fixed roughly at the average annual net profits to Government of the twenty years ended 1905 inclusive. I am not aware that either Professor Herdmann or Mr. Hornell was consulted as to the adequacy of this rent, but Professor Herdmann was quoted in the Debates in the Ceylon Legislative Council as having stated that he did not consider that the company could make their bargain a paying concern. Professor Herdmann was engaged by the Ceylon Government during Sir W. Ridgeway's tenure of office to investigate and report on the fisheries. He reached Ceylon in January, 1902, and left in April of the same year. Before Sir W. Ridgeway ceased to be Governor Professor Herdmann furnished some preliminary reports on the measures which he recommended with a view to the improvement of the fisheries, and he is now completing the fifth part of his detailed scientific report to the Government of Ceylon, four parts of which have already been published. Professor Herdmann's recommendations for the improvement of the fishery were printed in 1904 as a Sessional Paper for the Legislative Council of Ceylon, and I am not aware of any reports either by him or by Mr. Hornell other than those which have been made to the Ceylon Government. As Sir J. West Ridgeway's name has been mentioned several times in this connection, and he is himself absent from this country on duty, I think it right to add that a careful study of the Papers on the Question convinces me that he acted throughout in good faith and with integrity.

MR. DALZIEL inquired whether, having regard to the discussions which have taken place in respect to this matter, the Government did not think that it would be advisable to issue a notice to Governors of Colonies suggesting the inadvisability of their becoming directors of companies trading in the Colonies even when their term of office has expired.

MR. CHURCHILL: I will represent the view which the hon. Member has put forward to the Secretary of State.

*SIR J. JARDINE: Is not the effect of the expert reports that the annual profits since these improvements will be more uniform and far larger in future years?

MR. CHURCHILL: I have not a doubt that they will prove much more profitable in the future than they are to-day.

Flogging of Chinese Coolies at the Crœsus Mine.

MR. MACKARNESS: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Lord Selborne's long-continued efforts to obtain sufficient evidence for the prosecution of Withaner, the compound manager of the Crœsus Mine, who in March last admitted to the Superintendent of Foreign Labour, in the presence of witnesses, that he had flogged Chinese coolies in the mine, have yet been attended with success; and, if not, whether he can say what additional evidence, besides an admission of guilt by the accused, corroborated by other oral testimony, is required by the law of the Transvaal to insure conviction for a criminal offence in the courts of that colony.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Secretary of State has not yet been informed whether a prosecution has been undertaken, but he has addressed a further inquiry to Lord Selborne on the subject. I cannot tell what degree and character of evidence are necessary to establish certainty of guilt under the law of the Transvaal. Each case has no doubt to be considered upon its merits rather than in obedience to any rigid rule.

In reply to a further Question,

MR. CHURCHILL said the Secretary of State would not interfere with the discretion of the authorities in South Africa in this matter.

Importation of Chinese Coolies into the Transvaal.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON (Northumberland, Tyneside): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies for which mines in the Transvaal the 1,859 Chinese, who arrived in South Africa on board the steamship "Indravelli" on May 13th, were imported; for which mines the 2,000 Chinese, who arrived on May 28th by the steamship "Cranley" were imported; and whether any steps were taken by the Government of the Transvaal before they were admitted into the Colony to ascertain whether they were not criminals or otherwise undesirables.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Secretary of State does not know the particular mines for which these labourers were imported. The Government of the Transvaal has no means of enquiring into the antecedents of coolies arriving in the Colony. This can only be done in China but, as employers now realise that dangerous characters will be repatriated at their expense, there is every inducement to the labour agency they employ for recruiting not to ship coolies of this class.

Dr. Chiveiback's Claim.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he his aware that the claim of Dr. Chiveiback, formerly Red Cross medical officer with the Boer forces in the South African War, for compensation in respect of money and property taken from him by British military authorities, has neither been satisfied nor shown to have been ill-founded; and whether, seeing that the Central Judicial Commission has ceased to sit, the Colonial Office will take steps to have this claim freshly adjudicated upon.

MR. CHURCHILL: On the evidence before them, the Central Judical Commission felt bound to disallow the claim, and the funds provided for such claims have been fully distributed. In so far as there was subsequent corroborative evidence of cash to that amount having been taken from Dr. Chiveiback, a sum of £90 has been paid to him by the War Office in the special circumstances. As at present advised, the Secretary of State does not consider that Dr. Chiveiback's claim for war losses can be judged anew, as it would be liable to be quoted as a precedent for re-opening other claims and would involve the provision of further funds by Parliament. This His Majesty's Government do not feel able at this time to recommend to the House.

Boer Migration.

SIR J. DICKSON-POYNDER (Wiltshire, Chippenham): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can state how many Boers have emigrated to Argentina or other countries over sea since the termination of the war; how many have gone to German East Africa; and whether, or to what extent, this emigration is still going on.

MR. CHURCHILL: We have no accurate information as regards Argentina, and no information at all as regards other countries, but it is estimated that not more than 300 have gone to Argentina. I may add that twenty Boer families have recently migrated from German territory and have applied for land in the British East Africa Protectorate. They have thus voluntarily returned to British rule after having traversed the African continent to escape from it.

Jewish Colonisation.

SIR W. EVANS GORDON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the renewed outrages upon the Jews in Russia, any steps can be taken to give effect to the colonisation scheme of the Jewish Territorial Society.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Society are in communication with the Secretary of State on the subject, but no practical scheme has yet been submitted.

The Gilbert and Ellice Islands.

MR. LLEWELLYN WILLIAMS (Carmarthen District): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Government have yet received the Report of the High Commissioner for the Western Pacific, which was due last October, as to the complaints against the Resident Commissioner of the Gilbert and Ellice Islands; and, if so, whether they are prepared to lay it upon the Table of the House.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Secretary of State has only just received a Report by the High Commissioner for the Western Pacific on the Gilbert and Ellice Islands, which deals amongst other matters with certain complaints made against the Resident Commissioner of those Islands. The Report could not be published in full, as it contains matter of a confidential nature, but the Secretary of State will consider whether extracts from the despatch can be laid before the House.

Sir West Ridgeway's Commission.

MR. BYLES (Salford, N): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Sir West Ridgeway's Commission has completed its labours; and how soon the Report may be expected.

Mr. CHURCHILL: The Committee have completed their investigations in the two Colonies, and leave Capetown on June 27th. Their report may be expected to be in the hands of His Majesty's Government shortly after their arrival in the middle of July.

South African Native Administration.

MR. BYLES: I beg the ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Natal Government has appointed, or is about to appoint, a Commission on Native Administration and Legislation; and whether His Majesty's Government will be represented on this Commission, or will take steps on its own behalf, to obtain what information is necessary to arrive at an impartial judgment, so as to secure equitable treatment for the Natal Natives.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Natal Government has announced its intention to appoint such a Commission. The Secretary of State understands that the Commission will be a local one. His Majesty's Government do not propose to take steps as suggested which would be contrary to the principles of responsible Government. The Crown has retained the right of veto in regard to legislation inequally affecting European and non-European inhabitants of Natal but no other right has been specifically reserved.

Portugal and the Transvaal.

MR. MOLTENO (Dumfriesshire): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies what is the nature of the modus vivendi between Portugal and the Transvaal, of which the Cape Colony and Natal complain, and which is referred to in the speech of the Governor of the Cape Colony at the opening of the present session of the Cape Parliament, as being to the detriment of the British Coast Colonies; by whom was it made; and whether the Cape and Natal were consulted at the time in the matter.

MR. CHURCHILL: The modus vivendi is printed as an appendix to Cd. 2104. It was made by and between the then High Commissioner for South Africa and Governor-General of Mozambique in December, 1901. I am not aware that the Governments of the Cape Colony and Natal were consulted upon a matter which after all primarily concerns the Transvaal.

MR. MOLTENO: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has any official information showing that the modus vivendi between Portugal and the Transvaal has unduly favoured the trade of the foreign port of Delagoa Bay to the disadvantage of that of the ports of the British Colonies of the Cape and Natal; and that the trade to the Transvaal via the Cape and Natal has dwindled to small proportions as compared with that via Delagoa Bay.

MR. CHURCHILL: The question of the modus vivendi forms the subject of negotiation at present between His Majesty's Government and the Portuguese Government. The information given in answer to a written Question by the hon. Member to-day does not indicate that the Transvaal trade through Natal at all events has dwindled to small proportions.†

The Tse-tse Fly.

*MR. REES: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Dr. Davey's Report upon the tse-tse fly will be laid upon the Table; and whether Dr. Davey found a wild buffalo he shot in British Central Africa to be tainted with tse-tse virus.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Secretary of State has not yet received any report from the British Central Protectorate upon the subject of my hon. friend's Question.

† See Col. 614.

Aliens in Germany.

SIR W. EVANS GORDON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the German police authorities possess and exercise the powers of expelling aliens on the ground of their economic undesirability, in the form of undercutting competition with German workmen; and whether he can say upon how many aliens these authorities have served notice to quit Germany for economic reasons.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RUNCIMAN, Dewsbury) (For Sir EDWARD GREY): The German police authorities have the power to expel all aliens who may for any reason whatever be considered undesirable. His Majesty's representative at Berlin has made inquiries, and can learn of no cases in which foreign workmen have been expelled merely on the ground of undercutting competition with German workmen.

Spanish Tariffs.

MR. R. DUNCAN (Lanarkshire, Govan): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can inform the House regarding the progress of negotiations with the Spanish Government as to the proposed changes in import duties in Spain, so far as these are export duties on goods manufactured in the United Kingdom, or barriers to their entrance into Spain.

MR. RUNCIMAN: I am not yet in a position to make any definite statement upon the matter.

MR. R. DUNCAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can inform the House if goods supplied to customers in Spain, on contracts entered into early in 1906, will be subject to the tariff as in force at the time of contract.

MR. RUNCIMAN: I am not yet in a position to make any definite statement upon the matter.

MR. DUNCAN: When is one likely to be made?

MR. RUNCIMAN: I cannot say.

Macedonia.

*MR. CHARLES ROBERTS (Lincoln): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will lay before Parliament a Report from His Majesty's Consul at Salonica, showing the changes introduced in Macedonia by the civil agents in the several branches of local government, in the judicial system, and in the prison accommodation.

MR. RUNCIMAN: We have no Report from His Majesty's Consul-General at Salonica, but despatches from the British representative on the financial Commission, of which the civil agents are members, will eventually be laid, dealing generally with the administrative situation in the three Vilayets. With regard to judicial reforms, it will be seen from No. 138, Page 99, of Turkey No. 1, 1906, that it was not found possible to invest this Commission with the power of supervising the judicial Administration.

Russian Treatment of the Jews.

MR. HARWOOD (Bolton): To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the speech of Prince Urusoff, recently Under-Secretary for the Interior, in connection with the massacres of Jews in Russia; and whether any communication has been received from the Russian Government giving assurance that they will do their utmost to protect their Jewish subjects.

MR. RUNCIMAN: I have seen the accounts of the speech which have appeared in the Press. His Majesty's Government have not asked for any assurance of the nature indicated. But my hon. friend has no doubt observed the speeches made by Russian Ministers in the Duma, and the fact that the Minister of the Interior has issued instructions to governors and chiefs of police, warning them that every possible precaution should be taken to prevent riots or disorders directed against the Jews, and stating that the least sign of disturbance must be instantly suppressed, and that any neglect of duty in that respect will be punished in the severest manner.

Anarchist Newspapers in England.

SIR W. EVANS GORDON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any official information showing how many newspapers supporting the doctrines of anarchism are published in this country, and in what languages such papers are printed.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): I have of course official information, but I think it would not be advisable that I should make any statement on the subject.

London Juries.

*MR. REES: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether arrangements can be made whereby persons of comparatively small means living in the suburbs of London can be spared from such frequent calls to serve on special and common juries as are made upon them at present.

*MR. GLADSTONE: I have no authority with regard to the arrangements for summoning jurors, and cannot give any instructions in the matter. Service on juries is a public duty which must necessarily cause some inconvenience to those on whom it falls, but I have no reason to think that residents in London suburbs have any special grievance in this matter.

*MR. REES: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that such summonses seem to be escaped by persons living in houses with high rents?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir. I am not aware of that.

Motor Accidents in London.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state the number of accidents in the London area during the month of May last, from motor 'buses and motor cars, respectively; in how many instances have personal injuries resulted; and in how many cases have such injuries proved fatal.

*MR. GLADSTONE: During the month of May, 1906, the number of accidents known to the police to have been caused by motor cars (including motor cycles) within the Metropolitan Police District was 556. Of these 169 resulted in personal injury and four proved fatal. In the same month 400 accidents were caused by motor omnibuses of which sixty-two resulted in personal injury and two were fatal. Accidents caused by tramcars are not included.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): Is it intended this session to take any steps to regulate motor traffic?

*MR. GLADSTONE: I cannot say.

Miss Billington's Case.

MR. CLYNES (Manchester, N.E.): On behalf of the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has now had an opportunity of considering the papers relating to the case of Miss Teressa Billington, who was fined £10 with the alternative of two months' imprisonment at the Marylebone police court on Thursday last; and what decision he has come to in relation thereto.

*MR. GLADSTONE: I have now seen the evidence in this case. It was clearly proved that Miss Billington was, with other women, causing an obstruction in Cavendish Square, and that when a police officer asked her to move away from the square, she slapped him in the face three times, and, after she was arrested, kicked him twice. Miss Billington did not deny these charges nor question the evidence. In these circumstances the Magistrate had no choice but to convict, and I think that his sentence—a fine of £10, or two months imprisonment—was a reasonable and proper one. I have since received an appeal for leniency from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In consequence of this appeal I have, with the concurrence of the learned Magistrate, reduced the fine to £5, or in default one month's imprisonment.

MR. O'GRADY (Leeds, E.) asked whether, seeing that Miss Billington was acting on the advice tendered by the President of the Board of Trade in this matter, the Home Secretary would not use his influence to get a rehearing of the case. There was sufficient evidence to prove that this lady did not commit the assault complained of, but rather resisted an assault committed upon her.

Flogging in Prison.

Mr. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many floggings were inflicted in convict and local prisons during the years ended March 31st, 1905, and March 31st, 1906, respectively; and whether any prisoner was flogged more than once during those years.

*Mr. GLADSTONE: The numbers were as follows:—

	Convict prisons.	Local prisons.
Year ended March 31st, 1905 - - -	8	15
Year ended March 31st, 1906 - - -	17	30

One prisoner who received a corporal punishment of eighteen strokes with the birch on November 7th, 1904, also received twenty-four strokes with the birch on August 8th, 1905. No other prisoners have received corporal punishment twice during the two years named.

Probation Guardianship of Criminal Offenders.

Mr. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to a statement in the last Report of the Prison Commissioners for Scotland that a system of probation guardianship of criminal offenders is being introduced gradually, so far as the existing law allows, and with successful results, in the courts of some of the burghs and large cities, and especially in Dundee, whereby the operation of the sentence is suspended provided that the offender behaves well under supervision; and if he will consider whether it would not be practicable to introduce a similar system of probation in the Metropolis.

*Mr. GLADSTONE: The matter has for some time been engaging my attention. The Metropolitan Magistrates already in many cases exercise their powers under the Summary Jurisdiction and First Offenders Acts, and place criminal offenders under probation; but I am satisfied that further powers are required, and a Bill on the subject is now being prepared.

The Madrid Outrage.

Sir W. EVANS-GORDON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to certain passages occurring in two papers published in London, on 8th and 15th June, in which it is stated that the perpetrator of the recent outrage in Madrid was no criminal, but sacrificed his life in the interests of humanity, and in which regret is expressed that the object of the outrage, namely, the death of the King and Queen of Spain, had not been attained; and whether he proposes to take any steps against the persons responsible for these publications.

*Mr. GLADSTONE: I have seen translations of the passages referred to. The sentiments expressed are highly objectionable, but, as I am advised, it would not be expedient to take proceedings.

Sir W. EVANS-GORDON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman in what respect this case differs from that of a man named Most, who in 1882 was convicted of approving the murder of the Tsar of Russia, and was sentenced to a long term of imprisonment, and whose press was broken up?

*Mr. GLADSTONE: The case is a different one, but it is quite obvious that I am unable to state the difference across the floor of the House.

Sir W. EVANS-GORDON: May I ask in what respect the cases are different?

Richards, Limited, Aberdeen.

Mr. CLYNES: On behalf of the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil, I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether Messrs. Richards, Limited, Aberdeen, are on the list of contractors for his Department; whether he is aware that this firm have dismissed sixty of their workwomen, some of whom have worked for the firm for over thirty years, for having joined a trade union, and refuse to reinstate them unless they give an undertaking to withdraw from the union; and what action he proposes to take in the matter.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): This firm does not at present hold any orders from the Post Office.

American Mail Service.

MR. CHARLES DEVLIN (Galway): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that the mid-week mails for the United States were dispatched on Wednesday, 20th June, from Southampton by a German steamer; that, in view of the inability of the managers of the White Star Line to provide their fast steamers for the mail service, recourse is frequently had to German steamers for this purpose; and, seeing that when this course is adopted the mails are closed many hours before the usual time, thus causing inconvenience to the business community, will he say what steps the Government propose taking to ensure regularity in this matter.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I am aware of the course followed on the occasion in question, when, as sometimes happens, the White Star Company find it necessary to employ one of their slower steamers for the mid-week service to the United States, the mails are forwarded by any faster packet that may be available. This arrangement is adopted entirely in the interests of the public, and as it is always announced beforehand I do not think that inconvenience is caused by it. Although on such occasions the bulk of the mails leave London on Wednesdays earlier than usual, it is the practice to despatch supplementary mails at the regular hour for embarkation on board the White Star packet at Queenstown.

Millom Telephone Service.

MR. FULLERTON (Cumberland, Egremont): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he will undertake to supply a public telephone service for the town of Millom; and whether there are any other towns in the United Kingdom with a population of 10,000 without a public telephone service.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: Enquiry was made by the Post Office in 1903, and again in 1905 as to the demand for a telephone service at Millom, but not more than five subscribers could be found. The length of a trunk line to Barrow would be about twenty-four miles and it would be costly to erect. I will, however, have further enquiry made as to the amount of the guarantee required under the reduced terms lately announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There are other districts with as large a population as Millom without a telephone service, the provision of which must depend more on the demand than on actual population.

Preserved Foods.

MR. ALDEN (Middlesex, Tottenham): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he could see his way to pay a few surprise visits to the chief manufactories of meat and food products throughout the metropolis.

The following Questions also stood on the Paper:—

MR. ALDEN: To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will insist that, in the examinations conferring certificates on sanitary inspectors, some portion of the questions asked shall be on the subject of meat and food inspection, in order that every qualified inspector shall have a knowledge of this important subject.

MR. ALDEN: To ask the President of the Local Government Board if he will grant a Return of the number of inspectors in England and Wales who hold a meat and food certificate, and are fully qualified to inspect all meat and food products.

MR. ALDEN: To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware of the differences in method of the meat and food inspection under the various local sanitary authorities in London; and whether he will issue a circular to such authorities, recommending one uniform system of inspection throughout the whole of London and the extra metropolitan boroughs.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. JOHN BURNS, Battersea): Perhaps I may be allowed to answer this and the three following Questions together. As to the first, I do not think that any intimation that surprise visits would be paid to the chief manufactories of meat and food products in London would be likely to answer the object which my hon. friend has in view. As to the second, the subject of meat and food inspection is one of those upon which candidates for certificates from the Sanitary Inspectors Examination Board and the Royal Sanitary Institute are examined at the present time. The latter body have also a special examination on the subject. As regards the third Question, I would refer my hon. friend to the Return No. 326 which was obtained in 1904 by the hon. Member for the St. Patrick's Division of Dublin, and which gives the particulars he desires as respects London and certain large towns. To obtain a Return for the whole country would involve much labour and expense. As regards his last Question, I may state that I am aware of the differences in method of the meat and food inspection therein referred to. I do not think that at the present time advantage would be likely to result from a circular of the kind suggested, but I am considering whether, when some further information has been obtained, a conference of the local authorities specially concerned might not usefully be convened with a view to uniformity of action in this matter.

Canned Foods.

MR. T. DAVIES (Fulham): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the report of the medical officer of health for one of the London boroughs, drawing attention to the quantity of tin in solution he has found in canned food which had been packed for a long time, and to the fact that old tins often contain such a large quantity as to be dangerous to the health of persons consuming the food; and whether, seeing that the presence of this poison can only be detected by chemical examination, the goods apparently looking and tasting all right, he will, in order to minimise this danger, take steps to compel all packers to have the date of packing stamped on each tin.

MR. JOHN BURNS: I am aware of the report referred to. Legislation would be necessary to render it compulsory on packers to have the date of packing stamped on each tin. The matter will receive consideration, but I think further investigation is required before it can be determined whether such a requirement ought to be made in the interests of the public health.

Light Railways in the Highlands.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the provisions of the Light Railways Act are such as to render the construction of a light railway in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland impracticable without liberal local assistance; and, seeing that no such help is available in districts such as that between Garve and Ullapool, Ross-shire, will he consider the expediency of introducing legislation with a view to render the Treasury grants for the construction of light railways in the crofting counties of a more liberal character than at present.

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. KEARLEY, Devonport): The requirement of local assistance as a condition of a Treasury advance in furtherance of the construction of light railways seems to be a sound one, and there appears to be no ground for amending the existing law in the direction indicated in the Question.

Cornish Crabbers' Grievance.

MR. HAY MORGAN (Cornwall, Truro): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether his attention has been called to the fact that the French crabbers are continually coming within the three-mile limit of the coast of South-west Cornwall; and whether he will see that the gunboat, which is told off to protect the interest of the Cornish fishermen in this respect, will be ordered to visit this part of the Cornish coast.

I beg also to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether his attention has been called to the fact that trawlers frequently approach the Cornish coast at Coverack and trawl up the stockpots of the Cornish crabbers; and whether he will take steps to put a stop to such practices.

Mr. KEARLEY: My attention has been called to the fact that the trawl fishermen in the Bay of Coverack have been accused of fouling the stockpots of the Cornish crabbers, but so far no complaint has reached us of French crabbers fishing within the territorial limit. However, the Board of Trade will make inquiries and also communicate with the Admiralty to arrange for a gunboat to visit this part of the coast. I would point out that the crabbers whose stockpots have been interfered with have a remedy under Section 4 of the Sea Fisheries Act, 1883.

Llanelltyd School.

Mr. BRIDGEMAN (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether he is aware that the salary of the schoolmistress of the non-provided school at Llanelltyd has not been paid for more than four months; that several appeals have been made in vain to the Board of Education on her behalf; what steps he proposes to take to secure the payment of her arrears of salary; and when she may expect to receive the money due to her.

The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of EDUCATION (Mr. Birrell, Bristol, N.): The case referred to is a difficult and complicated one. I am in communication with the local authority in regard to the present condition of things as respects the teacher's salary, which is singularly unfortunate; and, though the position of the school and of the managers is gravely open to question, I am not without hope that the hardship to the teacher may shortly be removed.

Inspection of Welsh Intermediate Schools.

Mr. BRIDGEMAN: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education what inspection of Welsh intermediate schools is made by the Board of Education apart from the inspection of the Central Welsh Board; whether the Board of Education exercising the powers of the Charity Commission, have power to inspect such schools; and whether any of such schools are inspected by the Board of Education in their administrative capacity as distributor of secondary or other grants.

Mr. BIRRELL: The Board of Education, exercising the powers of the Charity Commission, have power to inspect all schools regulated by scheme under the Welsh Intermediate Education Act, 1889. By Treasury regulations made under Section 9 of that Act, they have further power to make such examination or inspection of the schools, in addition to that conducted by the Central Welsh Board, as they may think necessary, in order to ascertain whether the conditions under which the Treasury grant may be paid under that Act have been fulfilled. No inspection has so far taken place under either of the above-mentioned powers. Over eighty of the Welsh intermediate schools, out of a total of ninety-five, are recognised for grants under the Board's secondary school regulations, and each of these is periodically inspected by the Board under those regulations. Many of these also receive grants under the Board's regulations for the instruction and training of pupil teachers, and are fully inspected by the Board for the purposes of these grants.

Cost of School House Maintenance.

Mr. BRIDGEMAN: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether, in any arrangement under Clause 2 of the Education Bill, provision will have to be made for an apportionment of expenses between owners and local education authority whereby the cost of cleaning, lighting, and heating the school building, and of damage caused by wear and tear of the school furniture in respect of the use of the building out of school hours shall not be borne by the authority; and whether, in view of Sub-section 2 of Clause 3, a similar apportionment will have to be made between the persons providing denominational instruction and the authority.

Mr. BIRRELL: All the matters referred to in the Question must be matters of arrangement between the owners and the local education authority.

Religious Teaching in Schools.

Lord R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether it is contemplated by the Government that children who receive denominational instruction under the facilities granted in accordance with Clause 3 of the Education Bill will, on the same day, receive Cowper-Temple instruction from the local education authority; whether it is contemplated that denominational instruction will take place before Cowper-Temple instruction or at an hour when Cowper-Temple instruction is being given to the other children; and whether it will be the duty of the local authority to see that discipline is preserved in the school during the giving of denominational instruction, and to use the services of the teachers for the purpose.

MR. BIRRELL: The Answer to the first paragraph of the Question is in the negative. The Answer to the second paragraph is that the second of the two alternatives suggested is correct. The point referred to in the third paragraph will rest in the discretion of the local education authority.

Railway Companies' Receipts.

MR. LLOYD MORGAN (Carmarthenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether receipts given to passengers by railway companies, for sums exceeding £2 for excess luggage, are liable to penny stamp duty, and, if so, will he state whether any steps are taken by the Inland Revenue to enforce the observance of the law and to receive the duties, or to enforce the penalties set out in the statutes; if they are not liable, will he state under what sections of the Stamp Acts railway companies are exempt from payment of the duty.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. MCKENNA, Monmouthshire, N.): The documents referred to are treated as tickets authorising the conveyance of the luggage and are regarded as not in substance differing from an ordinary passenger ticket, and so not liable to stamp duty as receipts.

Royal Botanic Museum.

MR. J. RAMSAY MACDONALD: I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether, in view of the educational value of the economic museums in the Royal Botanic Gardens, Kew, and of the fact that no official guide has been on sale since 1895 for No. I. Museum, the Board will immediately publish one.

SIR EDWARD STRACHEY (Somersetshire, S.): A new edition of the official guide for Museum No. I. is now in course of preparation. It will be completed and issued to the public at the earliest possible date.

Crofters Act Amendment Bill.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland why the promised Crofters' Act Amendment Bill has not yet been introduced, and can he now say when it will be brought in.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. SINCLAIR, Forfarshire): The Bill is still under preparation, and I am not yet able to say when it will be introduced.

MR. WEIR: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Prime Minister during the general election referred to this question as one of an urgent character?

MR. SINCLAIR: I can assure the hon. Member that no time is being lost.

Ross-shire Schools Water Supply.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland, having regard to the fact that on the mainland of Ross-shire there are sixteen, and in the Island of Lewis eighteen schools in which the water supply is reported to be defective, will he state in how many cases action is being taken with a view to secure a suitable water supply.

MR. SINCLAIR: I may explain that in classing schools as defective as regards their water supply, it was not meant to be implied that no supply at all of drinking water was available for the school children. In all of the cases, as a matter of fact, good drinking water is available, but at too remote a distance in the opinion of the medical officer for the use of the school children. Of the sixteen schools on the mainland of Ross-shire, improvements on the water supplies are in hand with regard to five of them. There is no information available in the meantime with regard to the Lewis schools.

Upper Bayble Cottars.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if he will state how many cottars resident at Upper Bayble, Island of Lewis, have written to the Scottish Office expressing their willingness to transfer themselves to the mainland provided that the Congested Districts Board arrange reasonable aid for their settlement; and will the Board consider the expediency of making the conditions of migration known throughout the island by means of posters in the different townships.

MR. SINCLAIR: I would refer the hon. Member to my Answer to his unstarred Question No. 5 of June 11th.† No such cottars have hitherto expressed their willingness, so far as I know, to migrate to the mainland. In regard to the complaint made by these cottars and referred to in my reply of June 11th, the Congested Districts Board is in correspondence with the Landward Committee.

Highland School Board Franchise.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland, having regard to the fact that persons whose rentals do not exceed £4, while entitled to vote at parliamentary and county council elections, have no vote at school board elections, will he state when he proposes to present to Parliament a Return showing the number of persons in the Highland crofting counties who are thus deprived of the school board franchise.

MR. SINCLAIR: The form of the Return is under consideration, and at present no date can be named.

Sanitation in the Island of Lewis.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he has yet applied to the Treasury for funds for the improvement of the sanitary condition of the Island of Lewis.

MR. SINCLAIR: I am now in conference with the Treasury in regard to this subject.

Gort Licensing Case.

MR. DUFFY (Galway, S.): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney-General for Ireland whether he is aware that Francis J. Persse, J.P., sat at Gort, county Galway, Petty Sessions on May 3rd, and adjudicated in a licensing case, in which Mr. Hart of Gort was defendant, and he being a tenant on the estate over which Mr. Persse acts as agent; and whether the Government will take steps to prevent justices acting in the dual capacity of agent of disturbed estates and officiating magisterially at the same time.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. CHERRY, Liverpool, Exchange): I believe the facts to be as stated in the Question. It would appear that a Mr. Hart was prosecuted by the police at the Gort Petty Sessions for a breach of the licensing laws in having his licensed premises open at a prohibited time. The case was heard before the resident magistrate and two other magistrates, of whom Mr. Persse was one, and was dismissed upon the merits. No objection was made to Mr. Persse adjudicating, and the fact that he is alleged to be agent over the estate upon which Hart resided was not a legal disqualification to his acting as a magistrate at the hearing of the case.

Drumtullagh National School.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that in 1905 a site was secured for a teachers' residence in connection with Drumtullagh national school, county Antrim; that the manager of the school applied to the Board of Works for a loan to erect the residence; that the application was accepted on the conditions that the vesting order be deposited with the Board, which is impossible until the estate from which the site has been granted is sold; and whether, in view of the fact that years may elapse before the estate will be sold, and that the Board of Works have accepted sureties for the loan, he will order it to be granted forthwith.

MR. McKENNA: I am informed that the facts are as stated except that Amendments have been called for in the plans and specifications. At present the applicant has only a yearly tenancy, which does not afford adequate security for the proposed loan. I believe the difficulties in this case could easily be removed and I shall be glad to communicate privately with the hon. Member.

Limerick Postman's Pension.

MR. JOYCE (Limerick): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he can state the reason why the pension due to Matthew Larkin, postman at Limerick, who was superannuated on medical disqualification, December 21st, 1905, after thirty-seven years service, has not yet been awarded to him; whether any sum of money has been granted in advance, and, if so, how much; and whether, taking the man's circumstances into account, he will see that the pension will be granted with as little delay as possible.

† See (4) Debates, clviii., 690.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: The delay in awarding the pension to Matthew Larkin, postman at Limerick, is attributable to the fact that considerable difficulty has been experienced in obtaining authentic information regarding his early service. An advance of £8 in respect of pension was made to Larkin in March last and the payment of a further sum of £10 has been authorised. The hon. Member may rest assured that the pension will be granted at as early a date as possible.

Wage Disputes—International Action.

MR. WEDGWOOD (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been called to M. Clemenceau's proposed legislation dealing with State regulation of industrial disputes and contracts; and whether, in view of the fact that the success of such regulations depends largely on international co-operation, His Majesty's Government will communicate with the French and German Governments as to the possibility of arranging for simultaneous legislation on such subjects in their respective countries.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling Burghs): Yes, Sir, I have seen the passage in M. Clemenceau's speech to which my hon. friend refers. I understand, however, that the projet de loi embodying the intentions of the French Government has not as yet been issued, so that my hon. friend will see that we have no material upon which to found a decision as to the advisability of concurrent legislation in respect to this question. For myself, I am disposed to think that though there are many directions in which international co-operation may be of great service in bettering the conditions of labour, this particular question of the regulation of industrial disputes is so affected by the varying circumstances of different countries that united action may be difficult.

Education Bill Closure.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the operation of the Order of June 18th relating to procedure on the Education Bill, he will propose an Amendment to it providing that the closure at the end of each compartment shall be applied at 10.50 instead of 10.30.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No, Sir, I cannot see my way to proposing the Amendment which the noble Lord suggests.

The National Gallery.

MR. HORNIMAN (Chelsea): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he has or will consider the advisability of so altering the terms of the appointment of the new director of the National Gallery, whereby greater facilities may be given for the rapid acceptance or purchase of pictures, so that donors may not be discouraged by delays and money wasted by the pictures not being bought until after they have been sold by the original owners.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The present director of the National Gallery has been appointed on the same terms as his predecessor. The expediency of modifying the status and power of the director is receiving careful consideration.

The Ceylon Pearl Fisheries.

SIR J. JARDINE: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he will be able to give a day for discussion of the lease of the Ceylon Government Pearl Fisheries to the Ceylon Company of Pearl Fishers.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No, Sir, I am afraid it is impossible to promise a day for the discussion of the matter, however important it may be.

SIR J. JARDINE: Is the Prime Minister aware that the lease to the Ceylon Company of Pearl Fishers is causing much comment in Ceylon, Scotland and the City?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am afraid the exigencies of time are too strong to render any prospect of the debate possible.

English Printers in Canada.

MR. WALKER (Leicestershire, Melton): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether His Majesty's Government intend to introduce legislation, in the sense desired by the Dominion Government, which would render punishable false representations such as those which recently induced a body of English printers to migrate to Canada to take the place of Canadian workmen who were on strike.

SIR H. CAMPBELL BANNERMAN: The published correspondence regarding the case of the English printers who were induced to migrate to Canada during a strike at Winnipeg shows that His Majesty's Government have been most anxious to meet the views of the Canadian Government in this matter. On May 16th the Secretary of State requested the Governor-General to assure the Ministry that their suggestion that Imperial legislation should be introduced to deal with any future cases of a similar character would receive the careful consideration of His Majesty's Government. That undertaking is now being carried out, but I am afraid in any event that it will hardly be possible to introduce legislation during the present session.

Public Trustee Bill.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Prime Minister if his attention has been called to the recent absconding of another fraudulent trustee, involving widows and orphans in heavy loss, and if, with a view to affording the public the earliest opportunity of escape from these robberies of trust funds, he will press forward the remaining stages of the Public Trustee Bill, brought in by the Government, and read a second time in this House without a division. Has the right hon. Gentleman noticed three cases in to-day's paper?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I can only say that the Government will do all it can to further the progress of this most necessary Bill.

Board of Agriculture Vote.

MR. BECK (Cambridgeshire, Wisbech): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he will, having in view the interests concerned and the fact that the House of Commons has of late years devoted little time to agricultural questions, consider the advisability of allotting an early day for taking the Vote on the Board of Agriculture.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Vote on the Board of Agriculture will be taken, if possible, on July 12th.

Women on Local Education Authorities.

*MR. LEIF JONES (Westmoreland, Appleby): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been drawn to the statement made on behalf of the Board of Education to the effect that the Board desire to see women given a responsible position in the direction of public education, but that the Board cannot give effect to this desire because the remedy lies in the alteration of our Local Government laws; and whether the Government will meet the views of the Board of Education in this matter by giving facilities for the passing into law during the present session of the Local Authorities (Qualification of Women) Bill, which would render women eligible for election on the same terms as men on the local councils which are to be elected in March and November, 1907, and which will become the local education authorities to administer the New Education Act.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not understand that the Board of Education have ever offered an opinion on the question of associating women with the general work of local government. That would be beyond their province. The Government, however, earnestly desire to see women placed in a position in which they can take their full share in educational administration, and though I cannot give a definite promise of Government facilities at the moment, my hon. friend may rely upon it that we shall keep the matter before us.

*MR. LEIF JONES asked the right hon. Gentleman to bear in mind that unless the alteration could be made this year women would have no place upon the first local authorities elected to administer the new Education Act.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said he would bear that in mind.

Responsible Government for the Transvaal.

MR. BYLES: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the House will have an opportunity of discussing any proposals the Government may make for the establishment of responsible government in the Transvaal and Orange River Colony.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Yes, Sir, an opportunity will be given of discussing the question.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend): Will it be given before the House rises for the holidays?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I cannot say when it will be.

The Education Bill.

DR. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.) asked the Prime Minister whether he could so arrange that the important series of Amendments to Clause 4 of the Education Bill standing in the name of the President of the Board of Education, including one permitting denominational school managers in special cases to contract themselves out of the Act of 1902 and the present Bill, should receive discussion. As the Amendments were placed at the end of Clause 4 it was practically certain as matters stood that they would be put to the House on Wednesday at 10.30 without debate.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I think it is clear that ample time will in fact be secured for the discussion of the important matters referred to by my hon. friend, if only because all the points contained in the new Amendments are in effect raised by Amendments to Clause 4 which occur quite early on the Paper, and which, so far as I can see, will receive full and ample discussion.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) asked what would be the distribution of the work of Supply in the days yet remaining. He understood the Government intended to give only twenty days for Supply instead of the maximum of twenty-three days which had been commonly but not always given.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said on Thursday next the Irish Estimates would be taken, beginning with the Vote for the Congested Districts Board. On July 5th the Foreign Office Vote would be taken, and, if possible, a short time would be given for the further consideration of Scotch Estimates the discussion of which was shortened by the interposition of a private Bill. On July 12th the Army Estimates would be taken, when the Secretary of State for War would make a further statement. If possible, the vote for the Board of Agriculture would also be taken. On July 13th they would take the Navy Estimates, Vote 8.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: When will the Volunteer Vote be taken?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It will be the second Vote on the day set apart for the Army Estimates

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked whether, if a third day was given for Irish Supply, the Chief Secretary's Vote would be put down on that day. It was desired by some representative of the Irish minority to raise some points of importance on that Vote.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford) said the Irish Members would expect three days for Irish Supply. That was the minimum that had been granted in former years. He hoped the Irish Members would be consulted before the question of the particular Irish Supply to be taken was decided.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said that was a reasonable request. The Government would be glad to receive suggestions from the Irish Members and from all parts of the House.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he did not think it would be wise to limit the debate on the Foreign Office Vote by taking Scottish Estimates that day.

MR. WEIR pointed out that Scotland had fared worse this year than in any year in the last fifteen years.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Any apparent neglect of Scottish affairs is due to our excessive desire to give the fullest consideration to Scottish measures and to make adequate inquiry before framing them.

MR. WEIR: My reference was not to legislation but to Supply.

MR. J. RAMSAY MACDONALD: When will the Colonial Vote be taken?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I cannot name a day at present.

COLONEL WILLIAMS (Dorsetshire W.) asked at what hour the Board of Agriculture vote would be taken on July 12th.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It depends on the debate on the Army Votes.

EDUCATION (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL.

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. EMMOTT (Oldham) in the Chair.]

Clause 4:—

*THE CHAIRMAN having ruled out of order that Amendments standing in the names of the hon. Members for Spalding, North Hackney, Glasgow and Aberdeen University, Chichester, Ludlow, Wycombe and Preston,

*MR. EVELYN CECIL (Aston Manor) moved to insert the word "shall" in place of "may." His desire in so doing was to obtain equal treatment for all denominations so that they should be enabled to obtain extended facilities. If the purposes of the clause were carried out, every denomination ought to have equal rights to extended facilities, but from what they had learnt it was perfectly clear that the local education authorities in different parts of the country would not mete out equal treatment to the parents who applied. Even the other day the County Council for the West Riding of Yorkshire had done its best to drive a coach and six through the Act of 1902, and under these circumstances it was legitimate to ask what would occur in many parts, Wales, for instance, granting the word "may" remained and "shall" was not inserted. Supposing in the case of a small village in Wales four-fifths of the parents applied for extended facilities. What guarantee was there that the local education authority would accede to their request? It was most important, in view of what had happened in the West Riding of Yorkshire and Wales and elsewhere, that Parliament should clearly explain its intentions and make this clause mandatory. The right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Education had said more than once that he did not intend these extended facilities to be illusory. If that was his view he could hardly fail to accept the Amendment. He could not see how the clause could be otherwise than illusory if it was not made mandatory. The right hon. Gentleman had just given notice of a number of other Amendments which made confusion worse confounded. He had spent some time in trying to find out how they were to affect this clause, but he did not see that they covered the whole ground, though some filled up the gaps now admittedly left open in drafting the Bill.

DR. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.) said it was impossible to carry on the debate without referring to the Amendments of the right hon. Gentleman, and personally he had no objection to their being discussed at this time, but he would like to know whether it was in order.

*THE CHAIRMAN said that on the Question of "may" or "shall" now under consideration there did arise considerations affecting many, if not all, of the Amendments proposed by the President of the Board of Education. Therefore he thought that it would be for the convenience of the Committee that the general effect of the Government Amendments should be discussed on the present Amendment to some extent, but that attempts to amend those Amendments in detail must be left until they were reached.

*MR. EVELYN CECIL, continuing, said he failed to see how the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman, which started on the assumption that the local education authority refused to agree to an arrangement with the owners of the schoolhouse, covered the whole ground of Clause 4. Take this case. He would assume that the schoolhouse had been transferred. After an interval of some months, or years, the parents of four-fifths of the children in the particular district desired to get extended facilities for their children. The schoolhouse had already been handed over to the use of the local education authority, and the local authority refused to grant the facilities. What was to happen after that? Therefore as he did not see that the Amendments of the right hon Gentleman grappled adequately with the question he felt that his own Amendment was all the more necessary. It was much the simpler way of dealing with the matter. The alteration of "may" to "shall" was plain and simple legislation, while the Amendments of the right hon. Gentleman seemed to him to be very complicated. It was easy to imagine from existing circumstances what different tempers local education authorities might be in. In one case the local education authority might be in the humour to refuse the facilities altogether. In another they might be in the humour to refuse them to Church of England parents, but not to Roman Catholics or to Jews. Such a thing would be an act of gross injustice, and certainly was not intended by Parliament. Then why should not Parliament say so in the Bill? Further, if the local education authority was left to decide the question of giving facilities to four-fifths of the children, there would be a serious risk of religious quarrels at every local election, and he ventured to think that if the right hon. Gentleman did not make the clause mandatory the religious difficulty would continue as much in the future as in the past. They applied for equal treatment. It was not so long ago that the Prime Minister, speaking at Norwich on November 26th, 1904, said—

> "We want the child to be brought up in the faith of his father at least until he comes to such an age as to be qualified to be a judge of a faith for himself."

The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that the object of the Liberal Party was to secure perfect freedom of conscience and equal treatment. That quotation showed that the Prime Minister at that time was in favour of some such Amendment, and if that was the view upon which the Radical Party went to the country why could they not now accept the Amendment he moved? With regard to the penalties, he supposed if this clause was made mandatory the proper course would be for the Board of Education to apply for a mandamus against the local authority in fault. But the better course, in his view, would be for the Board of Education to withhold the Parliamentary grants until such time as the local authority had complied with the mandatory conditions under Clause 4. If the Amendment was accepted he would suggest that the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Education should introduce the penalties required on the lines he had just suggested. In urging the importance of the Amendment he might be allowed to say a word once more on the value of denominational teaching. Many believed that undenominational teaching was simply laying down a method by which everybody was to be a law unto themselves. He did not desire to press one kind of denominational teaching as against another, from this particular point of view. What was important was that denominational teaching should guide the growing youth of the country, watch over it with a helping hand, and save it from drifting away towards that indifference which as a rule led to a career of selfishness and crime. He claimed that the parents of the children should be able to obtain the special kind of religious teaching they desired. He felt convinced that unless they aimed at securing that right to the parents, by the adoption of this Amendment, the Bill had no chance of being regarded as a final settlement of the religious question.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 39, to leave out the word 'may,' and insert the word 'shall.'"—(Mr. Evelyn Cecil.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'may' stand part of the clause."

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N.) said he quite agreed with the hon. Member for Aston Manor that probably it was difficult for him to give reasons why the Government could not accept this Amendment without indicating very shortly the general effect and purport of the Amendments which now appeared on the Paper in his name. He thought that when the matter was fairly considered, having regard to the fact that the new Government Amendments did not in any way raise questions new to the Committee, but, as it were, only fixed and combined in a consecutive form separate Amendments which were now scattered up and down the Amendment Paper, the Committee would agree that time would not be lost if he were allowed very shortly to state the general effect and purport of those Amendments by way of answer to the Amendment which had just been moved. Clause 4 was the only clause with which they were now concerned, and any observations he made must be considered as rigorously confined to that clause. Clause 4, as originally drafted, was admittedly an obvious exception to the whole scheme and plan of the Bill as laid down in the first and most important clause. It had been called, and he did not quarrel with the word, an excrescence on the Bill; but it was, in the opinion of the Government, a necessary clause, and therefore ought to be made an effective clause, in consequence of what followed on the Committee adopting Clause 1 in the form it was introduced with the kind of religious teaching which followed on that. It had often been put to him and the Government that if they had only had, in the preparation of their Bill and in deciding on the scheme they would adopt, the courage to base their measure either on an entirely secular scheme or to adopt "the facilities all-round" proposal, there would have been no necessity for Clause 4, and the supporters of the Government would have been spared a burden on their political minds and opinions by the appearance, in a measure which they wished to support, of a clause that had an undoubted denominational flavour and character. That, however, was inaccurate. Had they adopted the secular system, or the "all-round facilities" system, he would at that moment have been face to face with all the difficulties which had made Clause 4 necessary; because it was not to be supposed that Roman Catholics or Jews or Anglicans would be content to say that their religious feeling was satisfied by setting aside three-quarters of or half an hour each day for the purpose of teaching a catechism or formulary. The Government would have been told that that was the least part of religious education—that it consisted of more than that, namely, the spirit animating the instruction—a spirit which was to be found, as much, he hoped, in a council school as in a voluntary school. It was quite a mistake to suppose that the Government would have got rid of any of their difficulties if they had adopted either the plain secular system or the plan of facilities to everybody to come into a school for half an hour at the beginning of every day. Clause 4 was a purely voluntary clause—that was to say, there was no kind of obligation on the local education authority to take over a school, nor was there any obligation on them, if they were anxious to take over a school, to give extended facilities. On the First Reading of the Bill he said that this clause left everything to the local education authority, and that that authority might do as it liked in the matter. That was a clear statement as to the character of this clause, and then, as soon as the Bill was drafted, the Amendment Paper became crowded with Amendments proposing to substitute "shall" for "may." Therefore the Government had to consider whether or not they could in these four-fifths schools meet the views which were represented by those Amendments. One of the new Amendments which stood in his name sought to remove the risk of any existing voluntary school which fulfilled the conditions (a) and (b) of the first sub-section being improperly refused by the local education authority the extended facilities contemplated by the clause. How did they suggest that that should be done? By providing for an appeal to the Board of Education, in the event of the refusal of a local authority to make arrangements for the transfer of such a school on the terms of the clause. That appeal having been given, he hoped the necessity for it would very rarely occur; but whenever it did, the Board might, if it thought fit, after considering the circumstances of the case and the wishes of the parents of the children attending the school as to the continuance of the school with extended facilities, make its own order as to the terms and conditions, including conditions as to extended facilities. Such an order, of course, when once made must be complied with. It would be the duty of a local education authority to comply with any condition contained in any arrangement made by such an order. But there was an alternative. This new clause provided that, if under any special circumstances of the case the Board thought it expedient, they might make an order allowing the school to continue as a State-aided school, receiving the Parliamentary grant, but not rate aid. He quite understood the objection on principle which every educationist must entertain to schools standing out of the national system; but this was an exception grafted on an exception. Assuming (a) and (b) to be fulfilled, he was confident that it was not likely that the local education authorities would take it on themselves to refuse extended facilities, but he did not quarrel with Gentlemen in any part of the House who thought that the possibility of their doing so was sufficiently real to entitle them to some statutory protection. People were certainly entitled to be cautious in this House and to consider remote possibilities, particularly when the matter concerned was one so vital, as they thought, to the interests of the children. But no one would think that it was very likely that in many instances the local education authority would, conditions (a) and (b) having been fulfilled, decline to enter into an arrangement because, if they did so, they would have to grant facilities. But supposing they did, then came the new Amendment giving an appeal to the Board of Education; and assuming that the Board supported the appellants and thought it was reasonable that the school should be taken over on the terms of extended facilities being given, it was more unlikely that any local authority would refuse to be guided by the Board of Education. If, however, they still held out, there was a mandamus. He confessed he would not allow himself to contemplate the possibility of a local education authority anywhere refusing to obey an order of the King's Bench. Was there any county in England or Wales where the King's writs did not run? Certainly not. Therefore the mandamus was a most powerful engine whereby to effect the purpose they had in view. But there was an alternative suggested even to the mandamus, and that was that the Board of Education, under any special circumstances of the case, might, if they thought it wise, allow the school to continue and to become a State-aided school, receiving the Parliamentary grant, but not being entitled to rate aid. He was therefore entitled to say they were dealing with a most remote contingency. Such a case was very unlikely to arise. But there was another Amendment which provided for a further contingency, he hoped even more improbable. Let them assume that the local authority had taken over a school on the terms provided in (a) and (b) and had not conferred the facilities though the school had been transferred, the relations between the school managers and the local authority might become strained — unhappy differences might arise, one party being supposed to be tyrannical and the other nagging and foolish. Such things did arise sometimes owing to the folly of people who engaged in a long correspondence with each other before the difficulty was reached. A little common sense on the spot, as a rule, got rid of these petty quarrels. Assuming, however, that the difficulties became sufficiently serious to make those interested in the school feel that their four-fifths facilities were really a sham, they might, after appeal, contract out, as it was called, or stand out, as the Government called it, and receive the Parliamentary grants only. He thought it was wise to insert this clause to show their good faith. He did not suppose the provisions for contracting out would include in any circumstances a serious number of schools; he ventured to hope they would not include any. These Amendments constituted a better and wiser scheme in the interests of all concerned than they could have by simply turning the word "may" into the word "shall." The advantages would be obvious. The Government Amendments secured that, if there was any difference as between the authority and a four-fifths school as to whether it should be taken over, there should be an appeal, with the result that, if in the opinion of the Board of Education the school should be taken over, it had to be taken over. In that sense it might become an obligation on the local authority to take over the school on the conditions and terms fixed by the Board of Education on the appeal. In the Bill, as introduced, there was no obligation, except in the case of schools held under an educational trust, which could not be carried out without transfer to the local authority, to come to an agreement for the taking over of a school. Everything was voluntary. The rent was a matter of bargain between the parties, and if they came to no terms the bargain would be off. Having altered all that, and made it possible by appeal to the Board of Education that the local authority should be required to take the school over, the Government held it to be much fairer and more conducive to voluntary arrangements to say at once that in these four-fifths schools the question of rent should not become an opportunity of haggling between parties, but should be eliminated. The Government also had an Amendment as to the ballot, the object of which was to safeguard and secure condition (a). He did not suppose anyone would object to a ballot being taken in order that there might be no doubt that the wishes of the parents had been genuinely and properly ascertained. In the same interest it was proposed to provide that no child should be reckoned who had not been in average attendance for six months. The object was plain and clear. It was to prevent any manipulation or moving about of the children from one school to another simply for the purpose of obtaining those facilities, which would most certainly interfere with the ascertaining of the genuine denominational character of the school. As soon as that had been ascertained by ballot there would be no difficulty in satisfying any person that the school which had stood that ordeal was the very kind of school contemplated by the machinery of this particular clause. These Amendments were, he submitted, better calculated than the Amendment to give effect to the desire of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and his own desire and that of the Government that the facilities contemplated should be genuine.

LORD EDMUND TALBOT (Sussex, Chichester) said he had asked the leave of his right hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition to intervene in the debate now because he was not allowed, by his doctor's orders, to remain in the House for any length of time. He was very anxious to be allowed to say one or two words from the Catholic point of view with reference to these proposals of the Minister for Education. He looked at the question of Clause 4 entirely at this moment from the point of view of his Catholic co-religionists. He might say at once that these proposals of the Government had been received by the Catholic body with great disappointment and much surprise. They thought—they were led to believe, in fact—that it was admitted by the Government that Clause 4 was inserted in the Bill for the purpose of meeting their case. They would very much like to know whether at the time the Government inserted that clause, and at the time the right hon. Gentleman received the Jewish deputation, he was aware that that clause, instead of meeting the Catholic case, destroyed practically one half of their schools. If the Government, in drafting their clause, were not aware of that fact, then the Catholics felt that they had some right, even though a minority, to ask to have it explained why the clause had not been altered for the purpose of meeting their case. As the clause stood, nearly one-fourth of their schools were absolutely cut out by the 5,000 limitation. Practically another fourth of their schools were wiped out by the four-fifths limitation. As a matter of fact, practically one-half of their schools, instead of being helped by this clause, were destroyed, and ceased to exist as Catholic schools. With regard to the new proposals, they were anxious to know what effect sub-section (b) had on them. It did not appear to him and his co-religionists that there was any security that these Amendments would be operative unless the local education authority were compelled to find accommodation for the one-fifth balance in the school. That was a point on which they would like some enlightenment. They would also like to know how these Amendments were going to apply to new schools. They did not see in the proposals of the Government wherein——

*THE CHAIRMAN: I am afraid I must stop the noble Lord. We cannot discuss new schools on Clause 4. They come in Clause 5.

LORD EDMUND TALBOT said he apologised if he had gone too far. Might he ask the Government to explain on what principle they made the limitation of the 5,000 area? It seemed to Catholics that the Government were putting a different value on the soul of a country child as compared with that of a town child. They wanted to know on what principle, in places where there was a Catholic school outside the 5,000 limitation, and in the same locality another school, the Catholics in that locality were to have meted out to them different treatment from what they would have in an urban area. With reference to the proposal of contracting out, the new Amendments, he admitted, might have in theory some attractions. In the form in which it was put in this Amendment it meant starvation. It was unfair and cruel on the teachers, unless the Government accepted the Amendment which the hon. Member for North Camberwell had very rightly and properly put down on behalf of his own profession. But if the Government did accept that Amendment, then the scheme, so far as the Catholics were concerned, was absolutely unworkable. It was unfair to the children, because it cut them out and deprived them of taking their share in the scholarships and in the general advantages to be gained in the district in which they lived. And all this was done at the expense of depriving Catholics of the rent. It appeared to some of them, at any rate, that the proposed abolition of the rent clause, to which the right hon. Gentleman had alluded, was very near breaking the promise given by the Government. If he might be allowed, he should like before he sat down to read Resolutions which had been passed by the Watching Committee of the Catholic Educational Councils on these new Amendments, and which had the approval of the Catholic bishops. These Resolutions were passed on Saturday last. The first was—

> "That the Committee, having considered the proposed Government Amendments to Clause 4, is of opinion that they fail to meet any of the substantial objections which the council have already submitted to the bishops as being among the grounds upon which in their opinion the Bill ought to be opposed."

Secondly—

> "Having considered the effect of the proposals to set up a class of State-aided schools, the Committee is of opinion that the provisions for establishing such a class as set out in the Government Amendments are open to the same objections as caused the Committee to pass on June 18th the following Resolution: 'That the Committee, having considered the probability of a system of contracting out of the Education Bill being proposed for the acceptance of the Catholic body, declares that any such proposal must be opposed as strongly as the Bill as it stands, unless it be accompanied by adequate Government grants having regard to the cost of education in the provided schools of the respective areas.'"

Lastly—

> "The Committee therefore submit that the Government's Amendments to Clause 4 as set out in the Parliamentary Papers of June 23rd be opposed."

These Resolutions, as he had said, had the approval of the bishops of his Church. In their opinion the only practical result of the new proposals was that they deprived them of the rent promised in the Bill, and gave an appeal to the Board of Education with the only possible result that that Board could give them an order to starve.

MR. BLAKE (Longford, S.) said it had been alleged that this Amendment would be an excrescence on the Bill. He believed that it would be nothing of the kind; it was really an essential part of the whole. Under Clause 1, how did the voluntary schools stand? After the Committee passed that portion of the Bill, it was pointed out that unless such words as "except in so far as subsequent clauses would alter their condition" were accepted these schools would be wiped out of existence. They would receive no recognition, they would be eliminated from the State system; they would not get any Exchequer grants or even have a right to that portion of the rates which the Catholic owners of the schools and the parents attending them had paid. It was obvious that except in the rare instances of endowed Catholic schools, or Catholic schools provided by wealthy patrons, the Catholic schools would be wiped out by Clause 1 unless they were revived by some special provisions. Clause 2 was the first attempt to provide for the essential work of revivification. The Government acknowledged that it was not their intention to wipe out these schools, but to make provision for the continuance of the work of education in the buildings of the voluntary schools. They recognised the rights of the owners and parents of the children attending these schools; but the words of the clause, after a long discussion, did not carry out the intention of the Government. It was said that the Catholics ought to have faith that the voluntary measure would be acted on and would be accepted by the local authorities, and that to impose compulsion on the local authorities would be harmful and intolerable. It was on the same principle that they were now asked to accept Clause 4, "save in so far as subsequent Amendments should be incorporated in that clause." That being the clause for the resuscitation of the Catholic schools, they must carefully scrutinise both the original provisions and the proposed Amendments. The Catholic case generally was that the great principle of admission, subject to such conditions and stipulations as this House might determine, should be defined and settled here in this central Parliament. It was here and here alone that the voice of the whole country could determine on what general terms and principles a settlement of this great educational question could be accomplished. He thought the House of Commons would not be equal to its great position if it threw into the hands of local areas and local education authorities, not elected for educational purposes only, a task to which it had been itself unequal. No greater humiliation could be put on the House of Commons than that it should abdicate its position in this way. The Amendment of the hon. Member, which he supported, asserted the view that the principle of admission should be placed beyond the power of the local authorities. Purely administrative questions might be dealt with by the local areas and local education authorities, although their decisions even on these questions were not to be final. But the primary principle of admission should be settled by Parliament and so also should the provisions of Clause 4 be made mandatory. These two parts of the question were entirely distinct, all that part connected with the design—whether the school was to be taken over under the limitations prescribed — being quite distinct from the other. The appeal on those questions which were to be in the first instance decided by the local authority was a great improvement and an essential security. But that did not in the least modify the objection of Roman Catholics to leaving to the local authority the decision as to whether a school should be admitted. That was their position on the clause as originally produced, and they had to ask themselves whether anything had taken place which would justify them in withdrawing from that position—the abandonment of Amendments on the subject of "shall" instead of "may" in order that they might adopt as satisfactory the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman. These facilities concerned more vitally than those of any other denomination, except perhaps the Jews, the Roman Catholic schools. Very large facilities were given to the schools of the Roman Catholic denomination under Clause 3, but they were of small or no importance; but the facilities under Clause 4 were to them the essential part of the Bill. There was no foundation so far as their information went for the view that the facilities under Clause 4 as it stood would apply to more than about half the Roman Catholic schools, which made it still more essential that where they did apply they should be made operative. Therefore, when the time came it would be their duty to move Amendments which would make these facilities applicable to a larger number of schools. Probably less than half the Roman Catholic schools would come within the four-fifths Clause, and that in his judgment would be a most deplorable condition of things, which would demand consideration at the appropriate time, rendering it far more essential for them to see that in the comparatively limited number of schools where it could come into operation, the clause should be made as effective as it could possibly be. Let the Committee consider for a moment what the condition of things was in which it was to become effective. What was the character of the school population that existed, and was to be dealt with? It was a school containing Jews, Roman Catholics, or others. The others were provided for else where, and it was therefore only those of one faith with whom this clause dealt. So far as they dealt with them for the purposes of secular education they observed the right rules for efficiency and saw that the State got an educated citizen. The only privilege these children of one faith had was that their education should be conducted simultaneously with the religious training of their own faith. How many Members of this House were there who in their calm and considered moments would think that it was otherwise than right and just that under these conditions the religion of the children should be taught in a way which their pastors and parents believed was the only way in which it could be effectively taught in the schools? That was the proposition the principle of which he wanted recognised by Parliament by a declaration of the right to have facilities if the conditions were complied with. Why should they throw it as a bone of contention to the different areas, to be decided with all the heat and bitterness that this question raised, without the light and instruction of this great central Parliament acting for all? Why not declare in favour of religious freedom, which could do no harm to any man, woman, or child? Why not settle the question once and for all by taking it out of the hands of the local authorities and not inviting them to exercise an option as they were invited by the Bill as drawn? Why should it be said that this great principle could not be declared once and for all? Right hon. and hon. Gentlemen had said that they did not believe that this was a case in which the local authorities, if they had the power, would care to exercise it. If there was such an overwhelming opinion in that direction, was not that an overwhelming reason for settling it once and for all? He thought the obvious duty of Parliament was not to throw this bone of contention to the local authorities. His view was that the declaration of the principle which they hoped to accomplish by the passing of this Amendment, and the appeal to the central authority could do more than anything else that he could suggest to obviate unjust treatment in those matters which in a primary state were left in the control of the local authorities. They must not permit the details of this measure to be made the pretext for a reconsideration of the principles which had already in theory been grafted on to an Act of Parliament. There must be an appeal to the central authority, because, Parliament having decided how the general point should be settled by a legislative Act, there must be reserved a final appeal to the central authority with the same responsibility, the same broad view, and the same constitution. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Education that the introduction of an appeal was an important improvement. As to the proposal of a ballot, some form must be adopted to determine whether four-fifths desired this change; he supposed that it was to be done by a vote, and, for his part, he had not a word to say against the ballot. The next was a most important provision — that in cases in which there were four-fifths in favour of facilities, those facilities should be granted. But there was to be no payment of rent at all. The Minister for Education would excuse him for saying that he could not characterise that proposal otherwise than as mean and shabby. He submitted that the large use of the buildings by the trustees might involve some question of rent to be paid by the education authority for the use of buildings during the remaining time. That was a question just as much as the use that was given on Saturday and Sunday. But let them take the substance of the section. The authority obtained by this arrangement the use of the buildings for all the purposes for which it was entitled to interfere. Was it to pay nothing for that to the owners who had built and improved the schools under circumstances of peculiar difficulty? Was it possible that Parliament would adopt that view? Although to those for whom he spoke this question was of great importance, he admitted that their primary object was to obtain that freedom of religious instruction which they believed to be essential; and if they were to be told that they were to be deprived of portion of the rent, if that was the price that Parliament was going to exact for religious freedom, he was sure that rather than go without the facilities they would pay the extorted price. But before it was decided to demand that price, let them consider whether it was a wise course to take. It was possible there might be some advantage from that course of action; it was possible that it might lead to the easier making of bargains. Their cardinal objection was that there was no declaration at present of a right or duty to give these general facilities. In the clauses providing for appeal there were some words which might indicate that facilities were to be given, but they left it open. He agreed with those who said that schools which, upon appeal to the Board of Education, might be contracted out, and only entitled to State aid and not rate aid, would in most cases be exposed to absolute starvation. No one doubted that schools that were defective in structural facilities, in educational arrangements, and in salaries to teachers would be allowed to lag behind. If those schools were not taken over by the local authority, and if on appeal to the Board of Education the answer they were to receive was "Go out," they would be turned out into the wilderness. The Education Board put a glass of water and a loaf of bread in their hands and turned them out with those supplies as their portion, but they were to continue to pay the rates for all the schools in their area. What was to be done with their share of the rates? Was it to be handed back to them to carry on, at any rate so far as their own share of the rates was concerned, that public work which they were bound to do efficiently for the satisfaction of the State, so that the population of this country might be educated? It was to be put into the pockets of the other ratepayers whose children went to the provided schools. The burden of the wealthy was to be lightened and that of the poor increased. He called the provision about no rent shabby and mean. This was what the right hon. Gentleman asked them in effect to be grateful for. Under these conditions they might well contend that in the name of conscientious scruple those other ratepayers of the area should decline to receive and put into their own pockets the rates paid by the parents of the Catholic children. He would have liked to have seen a nearer approach to justice introduced into the Bill. These contracted-out schools, however efficient the education they gave and however good the structure of the premises, were not to receive a shilling from the public purse. Under these circumstances it was clear that they were bound to deal with the Amendment before them as a declaration of principle which Parliament ought to make.

Mr. PAUL (Northampton) supported the Amendment of the hon. Member with the greatest freedom, though he hoped less responsibility, because he received no support from any of his Nonconformist friends when he endeavoured to oppose the third clause of the Bill, drawn unwisely and unskilfully, as he thought, for the exclusive benefit of the Church to which he belonged. The clause did not apply alone to the Church on behalf of which the hon. Member for South Longford had so eloquently pleaded. It applied to the Church of England, Wesleyans, and Jews. In the course of these debates he did not think the efforts of the clergymen of the Church of England in the cause of education had always received sufficient justice. By the accident of birth he knew as much about those efforts as any man in the House. The man whom of all others in the world he most honoured and revered had been for more than sixty years a clergyman of the Church of England. During the whole of that time he had taken an active interest in education, secular as well as religious. He took it long before Parliament recognised its duty in the Act of 1870, and there were hundreds of other clergymen like him in all parts of England. When he saw the President of the Board of Education reproached for not having bestowed more compliments on the Church of England he was inclined to ask himself whether an established and endowed Church, an ancient and a privileged body, would be likely or willing to accept or to ask for praise of that kind. They might as well request a few kind words on behalf of the British Constitution. The Church of England, moreover, was not only a Protestant Church; it was an Erastian Church, prepared and almost bound to accept such reasonable form of Protestant faith as the wisdom of Parliament might prescribe. He did not think he could deny, if he were driven with his back to the wall, that this was a Christian and Protestant Bill. It followed from that that they owed some little indulgence to the Jews and Catholics. The Jews in this country were a body of very wealthy men. But was that the case with the Catholics? It was very much the reverse. No Church in this country had spent more money and time in the cause of education than the Roman Catholic. But many of them were exceedingly poor. If we were to force upon them a form of religious teaching which they would not accept, their schools would have to be either supported out of their poverty or altogether closed. When he said this was a Protestant Bill he meant that simple Christian teaching—which he very much preferred to the phrase "simple Bible teaching," because there was a great deal of the Bible quite unsuited to children—given by laymen was suitable to all Protestant churches, but with the Roman Catholics it was not so. The authority of the Church in matters of religion was part of the Roman Catholic faith, and this kind of teaching was by her regarded as worse than nothing. To use a homely simile, it was like offering a man a cigarette after a good meal—it was not an imperfect form of enjoyment; it was a mockery of a real need. He did not so much share the mistrust of the local authorities expressed by the hon. Member for Aston Manor. He believed ninety-nine hundredths of them would do absolute justice as between Protestant and Catholic. But he took rather the view expressed by the hon.

Member for South Longford that there might be here and there some unreasonable body which might, if left to itself, throw the whole machinery of the Act out of gear. If he were a lawyer he should "pray in aid" the speech of the President of the Board of Education on the Amendment which his right hon. friend was nominally opposing, for the whole gist of his argument was that they must, in the last resort, have recourse to a mandamus in the King's Bench, and he asked in what part of this country the King's writ did not run. The ultimate resource, therefore, under the Bill, as under the Amendment, was compulsion. Then was it not more reasonable that the House should do simply, directly, and at once, what in any case it would have to do indirectly and in the long run? Surely it was no disparagement of local authorities to say that in a great measure of national policy, a question of the highest principle Parliament must itself decide. In a case of this kind, involving the fate of a large number of schools scattered up and down the country, belonging to a Church whose members had cheerfully paid rates and taxes for teaching other people's religion, and therefore had some claim that public money should be devoted to teaching their own—in a case of that kind he did not say that Parliament would be cowardly, but it would be derogating from its own high responsibility if it did not decide this matter for itself once and for all. This was a far graver question than the mere arrangement of items in a curriculum; it went to the bottom, to the radical principle upon which education rests, to questions which were agitated long before these religious controversies which excited perhaps undue interest now, questions which led the greatest of all philosophers to say, long before religious sects began to brawl, that education was not filling the mind with knowledge, but turning the eye of the soul towards the light.

Mr. LYTTELTON (St. George's, Hanover Square) said he regarded Clause 4 as one of the most vital and important clauses in the Bill, principally because he believed in denominational education, and also because he had some distrust of facilities which allowed a great number of doctrines to be presented concurrently in the schools. He felt fully the force of what the hon. Member for North Camberwell said the other day about the common religious lesson, and he would be glad if there could be that common lesson in most of their schools, because he desired to see Clause 4 effective and operative. He desired that the Catholics, the Jews, the Anglicans and the Wesleyans who had schools, should be able to maintain them in their integrity and have in them a common atmosphere and a common social religious spirit which might be engendered by their teaching. So far from fortifying Clause 4 the Amendments to be proposed by the Government seemed to be in fatal derogation of it. Many Nonconformists regarded it as intolerable that they should be called upon to pay rates for other people's religion. ["Hear hear," from the MINISTERIAL Benches.]

Mr. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Do as you would be done by.

Mr. LYTTELTON said that was their point of view, and he had not the faintest doubt that that belief would find root in the minds of numerous local authorities. The Minister of Education had throughout the discussions on the Bill recognised and even contemplated acute hostility to Clause 4 on the part of the local authorities.

Mr. BIRRELL: The possibility of it.

Mr. LYTTELTON thought that, having regard to Nonconformist opinion, it was a certainty that there would be strenuous opposition, and passive resistance was at the bottom of the feeling. What was the position created by the Amendment? Where there was a preponderance of four-fifths of the parents of any particular denomination, the local authority had only to say, "We will not come into your arrangement and we refuse it," and then there would be an appeal. The Board of Education could either reverse the decision of the local authorities or they could make the school a State-aided school. What was the President of the Board of Education likely to do? The right hon. Gentleman knew what it would mean to threaten people with imprisonment for disobeying an Order of the King's Bench. He knew that Nonconformists and others were quite willing to go to prison rather than pay a rate for the establishment and maintenance of a Roman Catholic school. If that state of things arose, what would be the position of the Board of Education, provided they were human beings, as he supposed they were? Of course they would shrink from the remedy of mandamus and resort to starving out Roman Catholic schools by reducing them to absolute difficulties.

Mr. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): Robbing the Catholics.

Mr. LYTTELTON said it was perfectly clear that a department would always take the line of least resistance. There were some departments in the past to which that general indictment did not apply, but as a general rule it was quite true. They had this local authority with local knowledge and prejudice against the Roman Catholic schools and denominational schools which were Anglican or Jewish. Then there was the natural pressure which they could bring to bear in the locality, and there was the mandamus with all its terrors in the distance and to which no department ever wished to resort. Against all these difficulties they were to have an appeal to a department whose general policy was against denominational schools and against the poor people who in the future would have not only to continue the struggle to keep their own schools, but also to tax themselves for the benefit of other schools which must under this clause exist and compete with them. That was the sort of thing that was hailed with applause by those who were anxious to attack denominational education. Was there ever a stranger method adopted of trying to satisfy those who were not content with Clause 4 as it stood in its permissive condition, and endeavouring to abate the hostility they must naturally feel to the non-mandatory character of the clause? He most emphatically urged the Committee not to be taken in by this extraordinary and illusory provision. There was no excuse for anyone being taken in after the speech of the Minister for Education, who was nothing if not candid. He told them that if a difficulty arose in the enforcement of their remedy there was behind them the State-aided school. What a preposterous admission! That was the very thing they had been contemplating all along, namely, the opposition of the locality to the clause and to the denominational schools and the attempt to enforce it by the Board of Education. Assuming that Board was willing to attempt to reverse the decision of the local authority, then there would be resistance by the local authority passive or active, and the Government Department placed in this position was not to enforce that which they had decided to be just, namely, the reversal of the local authority's decision, but were to return to the pre-1902 state, which every hon. Member who really understood the educational problem and every single expert regarded as a disastrous condition of struggling poverty which men submitted to who conscientiously desired to maintain the faith of their fathers.

*Dr. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.) said that after the Second Reading of the Bill he put down an Amendment to substitute "shall" for "may." He did not think that in this there was a matter of very high principle involved, but he thought it was a matter of administrative convenience. The Bill provided that four-fifths of the parents of the children must petition, and there was now to be a ballot to see that the petition was a genuine one. The children must have been at the schools six months and if extended facilities were granted there would be no rental. He ventured to think that was a very fair proposal. In the four-fifths schools they would get denominational religious instruction every day. Under the Bill if the managers got a teacher to volunteer they would be in the future as they were now, in the matter of religious education if the local education authority agreed, and he hoped they would agree.

MR. CARLILE (Hertfordshire, St. Albans): The teacher might be a Mahommedan.

*DR. MACNAMARA said the clause provided that the teacher might be a volunteer for giving religious instruction. In regard to religious teaching these schools would be substantially just as well off as they were now. Besides, they would be financially much better off under the Bill than before. Under the Act of 1902 the wear and tear of the buildings was a charge upon the public authority, while under this Bill in addition to the wear and tear the public was compelled to pay for the upkeep of the fabrics which, according to the late Bishop of Manchester, amounted to £700,000 a year for Church Schools alone. Therefore it seemed to him that Roman Catholics and other denominationalists would be better off than before. Over and above that it had to be remembered that the denominationalists would have the free use of the buildings two days of the week, and at least four nights of the week. The proposal that there should be no rental was a fair one under the circumstances. But why not make the clause mandatory? Clause 3 was going to be mandatory in effect. The Minister for Education said the other day—

> "I still have it in my mind if it can be done—and I think it can—to propose a new clause by an amendment of Clause 2, which will make it perfectly clear that the local authority, if it chooses, may take over a school and grant those facilities."

He disagreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London. He did not think the local authority would be pig-headed when they came down to actual committee work. A great many people were pig-headed on the platform, but it was a curious fact that men of all shades of politics and religion, when they sat down together day by day to the work of actual administration were able amicably to settle matters. which they did not seem to be able to come within a thousand miles of settling in this House. He thought that in every local authority, however, there might be one pig-headed individual. There would always be some crank or pig-headed individual who every time the matter came up would make a long and acrimonious speech as to whether these facilities should be given or not; he would squabble over this matter at local elections. In the interest of local government, and not of high principle—that was gone long ago—the clause as regards the first "may" should be turned into "shall." The question was as to harmonious working in the locality, and the Board of Education, or rather the President of the Board, had said that he would grant an appeal to the Board of Education. So far so good, but it was a roundabout way of getting the same thing for those who thought that they had no security. What he desired, and what he should certainly vote for, was that the Government should make "may" into "shall" in this line. The alternative of contracting-out under the clause had been ingeniously styled by somebody as the safety valve of Clause 4. He confessed that he was more than amazed that a proposition of that sort should come from the Government—that schools should be able to stand outside and yet receive State grants. That proposal went diametrically across the first clause which was the backbone of the Bill. It provided—

> "On and after the first day, of January one thousand nine hundred and eight, a school shall not be recognised as a public elementary school unless it is a school provided by the local education authority."

Therefore those schools which contracted-out would not be public elementary schools provided by the local authority. He had yet to learn how the Government could propose to give any Government grants to these schools seeing that they were not public elementary schools. That was a matter which would ultimately have to be considered, and Clause 1 would have to be materially modified to make this proposal consistent with it. He strenuously pressed this matter on educational grounds. It was wholly alien to the principles of Liberalism that there should be schools which derived nine-tenths of their income from public sources and yet were outside of public local control. The Act of 1902 did bring these schools to a small extent within the area of public supervision and control. The proposal now brought forward by a Liberal Government was to push them outside, and the parson was once more to become the one-man manager, and the teacher was to be appointed under religious tests. He was elected to see that religious tests were abolished in the case of teachers; and he was going to get them abolished. He did not see how the proposal of the Government was defensible in any way on Liberal principles. Previous to 1902 the teachers in the voluntary schools were paid 20 per cent. below the teachers in the provided schools. Many of the local authorities had, with great generosity, put the teachers in the non-provided schools on the same footing as those in the provided schools. This proposal would, in the vast majority of cases, send these teachers back again to the old scale of payment in the voluntary schools after having had two or three years well-deserved remuneration at the higher salaries. This was an amazing proposal to bring before the Committee. He was conscientiously bound to speak frankly and strongly upon it. If adopted, it would be disastrous to educational efficiency unless they could surround it with most scrupulously devised safeguards. It would be even more disastrous to the denominations, and he should be surprised if any denomination gave support to such a proposal. The schools had been four years under the rates. The maintenance of the schools had gone up by 20 per cent. How could they maintain the level of efficiency which would be properly demanded now, if compelled to contract out. Once more the children of the country were to be sacrificed because some obscurantists wanted to reduce the rates and some denominationalists wanted to tighten their grip on the schools. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Education had said this would only happen under special circumstances and in rare cases. He was perfectly confident that the President of the Board of Education did not realise—not the religious bitterness of the local authorities, for he did not think that would come into play much when once they had got to work behind closed doors—but the desire of the local education authorities to get a reduction of the rates. Every school they could compel to contract-out would mean a reduction of the rates, and the local authorities in order to get the rates reduced would make the conditions under Clause 4 so onerous as to compel the denominationalists to contract-out. For thirty-two years many of the local authorities successfully dodged the education rate; they said that they preferred denominational teaching. He thought Lancashire was a classical example of that policy.

MR. HAROLD COX (Preston) dissented.

*DR. MACNAMARA said Preston was one of the worst instances in the whole country. When he went to speak at Preston, some ten years ago, he had given to him a leaflet signed by the Mayor stating that Preston had never succumbed to the Godless school board system. Let Preston, said the Mayor, never lose the proud privilege of giving the children denominational teaching. But a postcript in heavy clarendon type stated that unless the denominational system was maintained there would be a sixpenny school board rate. That was the real trouble. He had supported the Act of 1902 right through for the reason that that did put these schools on the rates, though he admitted certain vital concomitants were omitted. That was what made the Act unpopular. If there had been more money in the central Exchequer—the South African war made that impossible—and the right hon. Gentleman opposite could have put his Bill of 1902 on the central Exchequer, throughout the great bulk of the country and particularly in those areas which never had a rate before they would not have had much passive resistance. The whole thing had arisen because of hostility to the local rate. The religious phase of the problem moved only a small number of very zealous people. Let them be frank about this matter. He was most anxious about the far-reaching effect of this proposal. People desired to keep rates at the lowest level, and the designedly onerous conditions made by local authorities would drive these schools to contract-out if this proposal were allowed to stand. He viewed the whole proposal, therefore, with the greatest apprehension, and a great deal of disappointment.

He did not like to go the length of saying that he viewed it with disgust, but he viewed it with a very near approach to that. He thought there could be nothing worse for the country than that they should set out to make a national system, then push these schools outside of local supervision, and allow them to have nine-tenths of their income from public sources without any scrap of local control. That was a thoroughly bad proposal. He was surprised at the quarter from which the proposal came. He asked the President of the Board of Education what sort of guarantee could he get that these poor people would have sufficient income from private sources in addition to the Government grant to keep their schools up to the level of the provided schools in the area? He asked him what sort of provision would he make for the teachers in those schools? He maintained that these schools would have gone long ago had it not been for the zeal and self-sacrifice of the voluntary school teachers who had formerly been paid 20 per cent. below the salaries of other teachers in the same locality. What assurance was the right hon. Gentleman going to give the Committee that the teachers in the schools which were to be thrust out, would be paid a fair day's pay for a fair day's work or that they would have their present salaries secured to them? He put the matter very strongly, he hoped not offensively, but he maintained that the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman were reactionary, and he was extremely sorry that they had ever been made by a Liberal front bench.

Mr. LAURENCE HARDY (Kent, Ashford) said that the present Amendment was of very considerable importance; but not a single word, except by the right hon. Gentleman, had been said against it. That fact alone should make hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial benches pause before they gave their consent to the propositions put forward by the Minister for Education. He agreed with much that had been said by the hon. Member for North Camberwell, but he wished to enter a caveat against the argument that they should trust the local authorities on the question of rent seeing that under Clause 4 the voluntary schools would get quite as good advantages as they had before. He would point out that that was not so. So far as they knew, the religious instruction under Clause 4 was to be paid for by the denominations, and if that teaching was to be given by the teachers there was no provision in the Bill which ensured that those teachers should be such as could give the religious teaching nominally provided for under the clause. The rent question did not affect the Church of England schools as much as those of other denominations. In one or two instances in Kent, in which the question of rent would arise, the Education Department had issued an instalment of a Return from which it would be seen what was the position of the Education Department. In that return 480 voluntary schools were dealt with, 375 of which the officials of the Department said were bound by educational trusts. If that were so the statement of the right hon. Gentleman was fairly possible, that the rent for these schools would be only a pepper-corn rent. Therefore it was very likely that for only 5 per cent. of the schools would any rent be got at all. He thought that in these circumstances longer time for the discussion of the financial proposals in the Bill was more than ever necessary. The Committee must be made aware of what was the use that was to be made of the £1,000,000 that was to be voted. It would be within the recollection of the Committee that, during the consideration of Clause 2, the President of the Board of Education said that when Clauses 3 and 4 came on for discussion, many of the difficulties that had arisen under Clause 2 would be got out of the way; and that he hoped the gap the existence of which he admitted would be filled up in regard to the local authorities taking over efficient schools; but under the proposed new Amendments instead of the gap being filled up it had been made wider than ever. He would be very glad to ascertain whether or not the State-aided schools which were described as "transferred voluntary schools" would come under Clause 2. That was a very important point if they were to be deprived of rent, of any share of the rates, and of any advantage of having the fabric of the schools maintained. They had heard of the intolerable strain as the cause of the Act of 1902, especially on the voluntary schools in the rural parts of the country, but it was these same schools that were being cut out from the application of this Bill if it became law. He entirely agreed with the hon. Member for North Camberwell so far as the unfortunate position of the teachers was concerned under the new Amendments; and he could not understand how hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial Benches could defend the system proposed to be established. He insisted that the clause was very difficult to follow, and that it was almost impossible to tell how the Education Department was to find out the desires of the parents or to trace out the exact moment at which the scheme should be made applicable. It seemed to him that Clause 4 should be made mandatory, and that it should be laid down that the local authorities should not be put in a position in which they could act, in the words of the right hon. Gentleman himself, in a manner that was not just, righteous, or fair. For these reasons he respectfully suggested that the Government ought to accept the Amendment.

Mr. BELLOC (Salford, S.) said that this was a practical matter, and one that was more than ordinarily difficult because it related to the future. Nearly every argument that had been used in favour of making Clause 4 mandatory had been presented on some supposed action which the local authorities would take in the future. He could not say too strongly not only for himself, but for many Catholics who voted Liberal at the last election, and who would vote Liberal again, that they as a rule trusted the local authorities. They recognised that the resistance to the Act of 1902 was an attempt on the part of Nonconformists to remedy a grievance which might easily have been remedied. He admitted that there might be cases in which a pig-headed local authority, or even a pig-headed individual on a local authority, might bring this system of national control into contempt and to a deadlock. The question was whether the Committee would consent to get rid of that deadlock by making the clause mandatory or by giving under the Bill a power of appeal to the Board of Education. In either case there would have to be coercion, and whether that coercion was contained within the four corners of the Bill or attained by an administrative dodge was of little importance. For himself he would say that so far as he knew, the value of those different methods of procedure was very nearly equal. If some local authority did not want to keep up a four-fifths school it would not be blind to the action of the Board of Education under the Bill and it would not be blind to the other remedy which might be afforded. On the whole, however, he thought it would be more straightforward, more logical, and more in accordance with his pledges to maintain the rights of Catholic schools if he voted in favour of the clause being made mandatory.

*__Sir FRANCIS POWELL__ (Wigan) said he had among his constituents a large body of Roman Catholics, and, admiring as he did their work in the cause of education, he felt sympathy with them in reference to the present situation. He hoped this clause would be made mandatory, because the decisions of local authorities were eminently uncertain and liable to be changed from election to election. Those who lived in the West Riding of Yorkshire had had occasion to lament the policy of the county council which they regarded as unjust, while their action was harsh. The High Court had also condemned it as illegal. How could he support a proposition which would give a county council of that kind discretion in regard to the facilities to be granted under this clause? Local control entailed debate on all subjects of education. With a purely secular system it might be possible to keep religious questions out of the arena, but if they admitted religion into the schools the subject could not be kept out from local controversy. He desired to minimise everything which would tend to arouse ill-feeling, and therefore he opposed the proposals of the Government, believing that they would cause strife and the separation of people who ought to be able to work together to promote education for the young.

MR. ALFRED HUTTON (Yorkshire, W.R., Morley) said that all the speeches to which they had listened in that debate had been in favour of the Amendment for inserting the word "shall" as against "may." At the risk, however, of being called a "pig-headed individual" he ventured to say a word in favour of the retention of the word "may." He would point out that many hon. Gentlemen who spoke originally in condemnation of Clause 4 now spoke in favour of making it mandatory. He thought the local education authorities would not be as ready as some hon. Members supposed to divest themselves of responsibility in order to save a little rate. He thought on the contrary that the local education authorities would have the tendency to keep all the power they possibly could. He was not in favour of contracting-out, but if it were a choice between two evils he preferred it to having the clause made mandatory. But he regarded the clause, as a whole, as a very bad one, whether contracting out was allowed or not. Nonconformists had in the past objected to pay rates for teaching other people's religion, but they did not ask other people to pay rates for teaching their religion. He had always spoken in favour of leaving all religious education in the hands of the Church and taking it away from the hands of the State. The representatives of Nonconformists disputed the assertion that it was important in the interests of education that mere denominational religion should be taught in the school. They disputed it, as they believed, in the interests of education, because they thought that if they were going to try and safeguard religion by Clause 4 they would create strife, ill-feeling, and objection to that kind of religious teaching by the State, and in the long run do more harm than good. At any rate he believed with all his heart that no Nonconformist would ask anyone to pay rates for the teaching of his religion. It was said that the religion taught in council schools was Nonconformist religion, but it was a most extraordinary statement to make. If it was brought home to Nonconformists generally that the religion taught in Council schools was Nonconformist as opposed to Anglican or Catholic he was convinced that practically all Nonconformists would agree that the only solution would be secular education. He believed Clause 4 was a valuable concession to the denominationalists. Previous speakers had all minimised it, but he thought it was a great deal, and he was afraid it gave away the position of the teachers. He would oppose the Amendment, and he hoped the Government would not yield on this point. It was extraordinary that Clauses 2 and 3 were now found to be absolutely mandatory though they had thought they were both optional. He hoped the Committee would save the situation in regard to the fourth clause.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.) said the hon. Member for the Morley Division had said that Nonconformists did not desire in the slightest degree that their religion should be taught at other people's expense. He accepted the statement quite freely, and he would tell him in return that the position of Catholics was that they claimed that their money should not be taken from them for the maintenance of schools where Protestant religion was taught. It had been stated—and the statement had apparently given some offence to hon. Gentlemen opposite,—that Cowper-Temple teaching was in reality Nonconformist religion. He did not make that statement himself, but he did say that whether it was near the Nonconformist religion or not it certainly was a form of Protestantism, and, as such, Catholics ought not to be called upon to pay for its support. If the President of the Board of Education succeeded in the Amendment which he had placed on the Paper, a number of the Catholic schools of this country would be placed back in the position in which they were before 1902; that was to say, they would have to pay once more largely out of their own pockets for the maintenance of their own schools, and at the same time they would be called upon to pay rates for the maintenance of the schools in which Cowper-Temple Protestant religion was taught. That was not justice towards the Catholic people of this country. The proposal that these schools, which were the result of the sacrifice of the savings of the poorest portion of the community, were to be penalised if the parents of the children attending those schools declared in favour of the religion in which they believed, was something which he never expected of the President of the Board of Education, or of a Government calling itself Liberal. These Catholic schools were, as had been said, a veritable wonder to behold. They had been built out of the scanty savings of the hardest working portion of the population. These people had suffered privation, and, in many cases, the pinch of hunger itself; and yet, no matter how they had to deprive themselves and their children of the ordinary necessaries of life, they always found sufficient to pay, as far as their means would allow, for the schools in which they believed their children would be taught that religion which was dearer to them almost than life According to the Amendment put on the Paper by the right hon. Gentleman they were told that if facilities were given for the teaching of religion in which the people firmly, passionately, and devotedly believed, no rent whatever was to be paid for the use of the school. A proposition of that kind was manifestly unjust. It came as a surprise to him at any rate, and he believed it would come as a shock and a surprise to the great majority of liberal-minded people of this country. Why should a school, the parents of the children attending which declared in favour of certain denominational education, be deprived of rent? Why should they not be placed in this matter upon the same footing as other schools? Why, in a word, should an effort be made, by the trick of withholding rent, to prevent the parents having their children taught the religion in which they believed? This one provision alone would do more perhaps than anything that had as yet occurred to inflame the feeling of the Catholic people with the idea that an injustice had been done to them. Did Liberal Members imagine that Roman Catholics would tamely submit to pay rates to maintain schools for religion to be taught in which they did not believe, while they themselves were to be deprived of all share of the rates? Did those Nonconformists who boasted so much about being passive resisters in regard to the Education Act of 1902, imagine that the Catholics would, out of their hard earnings, tamely pay not only for their own schools, but also for the schools which satisfied Nonconformists? Without in the least anticipating that there would or desiring for a single moment that there should be any trouble, he did say that the Catholic people would not tamely submit to a system so manifestly unjust. It would not be reasonable to believe that any considerable number of local authorities, because of religious prejudice, would shut out a section of the community from having the children properly educated; but he did know that there were places where the feeling of a portion of the community against the Catholic religion ran so high that pressure would be brought to bear upon the local authorities to shut out the Catholic schools. Surely it was not an unreasonable thing that they should ask Parliament, if it were satisfied that under certain circumstances certain religion should be taught, to say that it should be the law, and not leave it to small local authorities to decide. In the main he believed the local authorities of this country administered their ordinary work in an excellent manner, but those authorities were not originally intended to administer education or to decide upon questions of religion, and it was a perfectly monstrous thing to say that the question of religion was to be made an initial issue at local elections, as would be undoubtedly the case if this clause were not made mandatory. He appealed to hon. Members on the Ministerial side to have the courage of their convictions. He was certain every hon. Gentleman was anxious to deal fairly with the schools of every denomination and that, if every hon. Gentleman were free from Party and outside influences, he would declare that, as it had been deemed wise by Parliament that under certain circumstances in certain schools denominational teaching should be given, it should be incumbent upon the local authority to grant the necessary facilities. He would far sooner have the fourth clause made mandatory than any provision reverting to the position of 1902, unless a guarantee were given that they would not be called upon, in addition to paying for the maintenance of their own schools, to help to maintain schools supported by hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial side. One matter at least for congratulation in the debate was the exhibition of fairness and good temper that had been displayed. He could assure hon. Gentlemen representing Nonconformists that they who represented the Catholic people had not the slightest atom of ill-will towards them. Their sympathies were for all people who had been unjustly and unfairly treated in the matter of conscience and religion. Hon. Gentlemen opposite had had their battles to fight and had had their dark days as the Catholic representatives had had theirs. He appealed to them to recognise that in the stand they were making the Irish Members were struggling for the recognition of that which was most dear to the people and something which they would never relinquish. The hon. Member for North Camberwell had said that he thought the Denominationalists were greedy. Could that be said of Catholics who asked that in the schools which they had built out of their savings and sacrifices their children should be taught that religion which they held dearer than life itself?

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.) said they certainly found themselves in a very peculiar position. So far as he knew, not one single Member had risen from any part of the House to give any full support to the proposition of the Government. The only hon. Member who rose apparently to do so was the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Morley Division of the North-West Riding; but, although the hon. Gentleman supported the present form of the Bill so far as "may" was concerned, and expressed his preference for "may" over "shall," he coupled that assurance with a declaration that he was totally opposed to the whole of the clause in principle and was not, and never could be, a convert to it. That was an extremely exceptional position for a strong Government to find itself in in the discussion of their principal Bill. The result was to impress upon his mind what he had felt all along, that it was almost impossible to amend this Bill, that the Bill was drawn on wrong lines, and that upon those lines it was impossible to make a final settlement, which he did the right hon. Gentleman the justice to believe it had been his ambition to achieve. Taking the point they were discussing, although he would vote for the Amendment, he cared very little whether it was carried or not. The balance seemed to him, as to the hon. Member for South Salford, to lean on the side of the Amendment. But suppose the Amendment was not carried. In that case the clause, which he firmly believed was honestly introduced in order to give facilities in a large number of cases, and especially in the case of Catholic schools, would be illusory. If the Amendment remained the clause would be a sham. That was admitted, unconsciously if they liked, in all the speeches made in connection with this Amendment. There was not a single speaker on the Treasury Bench who had not admitted that if the clause was not made mandatory there might be, and there would be, local authorities who would refuse to give the facilities required. Then they proposed an elaborate scheme—so complicated that few outside the House not experts in the matter understood it—the effect of which would be to allow the schools which were not permitted by the local authority to enjoy the facilities to contract themselves out. In that case, as had been pointed out with unmistakable clearness by the hon. Member who had just sat down, they were doing a great injustice to those schools, whether Catholic or of any other denomination, by putting them in an impracticable position. He did not know that he agreed with what had been said about those schools being in an intolerable position in 1902; but whether they were or not at that time they would certainly be in an intolerable position now that they had to find double and treble the money which they found it impossible to find in other circumstances. If the clause remained as it was—a discretionary clause—it was illusory and would not be accepted by anybody as an adequate fulfilment of the pledge which they had all understood the Government to give.

If they accepted the Amendment and made the clause mandatory, then in the same spirit and for the same reasons they must go on to make other Amendments in the clause. That would be in strict accordance with the promises they had given. They must turn "may" into "shall." They must do away with those absurd and ridiculous and inconsistent and almost insulting distinctions between urban and other areas. They must do away with the absurd proposition that four-fifths of the parents might have a conscience and that three-fifths were not entitled to anything of the kind. All these things would have to be done away with. Then he granted that they would have carried out their pledges and have provided facilities by which the parents of the children who desired it would be able to obtain denominational teaching; they would have met the case of the Catholics; they would have met the case of the Jews; they would have met the case to a very large extent, he should think entirely, of the Anglican Church. But then what would the passive resisters say? They would have produced a Bill which would give more ground for passive resistance than anything in the Bill of 1902. They would have introduced a Bill in which they would altogether have neglected their great principle of the freedom of teachers from tests; they would have introduced a system in which they would not have given the public the control of the denominational schools. They would have made every person in the community pay for religious instruction of which he did not approve. That was the alternative to leaving the clause discretionary. If it was left discretionary it was a delusion and a sham, and if it was made mandatory it was not their Bill. The proposal made at an earlier period was their only possible solution. It was not, as he had ventured to say before, or it need not be, the secular solution. It was a separation between religious and secular instruction. That they had chosen to represent as the secular solution quite erroneously, and they had on that account condemned it. But unless they could, in some way or other, bring back the Bill to those lines or to a position in which procedure on those lines would be possible, they could not do justice between the religious sects of this country and they could not produce any final settlement.

*MR. SPICER (Hackney, Central) said he believed that Clause 4 was an honest attempt to meet a very difficult position, and for that reason he should support the Government in maintaining "may" as against "shall." Many of the speeches that afternoon had proceeded on the basis that the local authorities of the country were distrusted, and he was rather surprised. Whilst he gave hon. Members opposite full credit for doing everything in their power to uphold the Catholic religion, still Members on the Ministerial side had sacrificed something to give them the power they desired and had trusted them just as they asked hon. Members to trust local authorities now. Local authorities deserved well of this House, and they were doing better service than Parliament could do if they attempted to legislate for them. He did not admit that the clause contained everything that was attributed to it. It was a reasonable clause because it was to be worked under the local authority. A good deal of criticism had been read into it, because hon. Members thought of the present denominational majorities of non-provided schools rather than the ordinary action of local authorities. He supported the clause because it trusted local authorities and because he believed that they would not wish to burn their fingers in a conflict with the Roman Catholic Church. He therefore trusted that the House would uphold "may" as against "shall."

*SIR HENRY CRAIK (Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities) said his preference for a contracting-out provision in Clause 1, instead of on this clause, had been justified by the debate. When he proposed contracting-out it was as a voluntary act when a school had ample means for carrying on its work, but here it was a course to which a school would be driven in its extremity, without resources to meet its needs. The contracting-out he contemplated was not only voluntary, but it involved independent management. He asked the attention of the Minister for Education to this point. Did he or did he not intend that these schools, which were to lose the benefit of all share in the rates if they contracted out, were still to be managed largely by members of the local authority? Did the Amendment contain any provision about this at all? It left the school under the management of a body upon which the local authority would be largely represented, and yet the school would not share in the rates raised by that authority That was to say, the schools of the Roman Catholics and the Anglicans would be left to a very large extent under the management of the local authority, while at the same time they would not share in the benefit of the rates raised by the local authority. Thirdly, he would point out another matter which he thought the right hon. Gentleman had overlooked, and it was a very important one. In his Amendment the right hon. Gentleman declared that these schools were to share in the grant, but surely he had not turned his attention to the item of grant under Section 10 of the Act of 1902. What did the right hon. Gentleman mean to do with regard to that? There was no provision whatever by which the grant under Section 10 of the 1902 Act could be allocated to a particular school. It was to be allocated according to the scale only in respect of attendance at schools which were provided and managed by the local authority. This would involve an additional hardship upon the voluntary schools of the Roman Catholics and the Anglicans. They would get the annual grant under the Code, but they would be entirely deprived of their share of the £1,400,000 or £1,500,000 a year under the section he had mentioned. For these reasons he drew a strong distinction between the principle of contracting-out which he suggested, and that proposed by the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. HARWOOD (Bolton) said the Minister for Education appeared this afternoon to be in the position of a good man struggling with adversity. They all felt that the right hon. Gentleman was being put into a very painful position, and they recognised that, whatever might be their views on this or that particular matter, he, at any rate, was trying to do his best to meet the complicated elements of this difficult part of the Bill. He was unable to agree with the right hon. Gentleman in this matter. He differed from him for a reason which he did not think had yet received sufficient acknowledgment in the Committee. Those who had attacked the view now put forward by the Government had been told over and over again that they were suspicious of the local authorities. It was in the interest of the local authorities that he supported the Amendment to make the clause mandatory. All friends of local government must feel that they were showing their friendship for the local authorities best by keeping the question of religion out of their ken. When they brought the element of religion into a local contest they brought in an element which dominated all others. Therefore he would vote for the Amendment primarily for the sake of local government. Local government affairs had been increasing in complexity in recent years. Local authorities had now to deal with gas, water, electricity, trams, parks, and education, and already there was found some difficulty in getting proper men to take part in local work, and therein lay a great danger to municipal life.

*THE CHAIRMAN said that though the limits of discussion were wide, it was, after all, a question as to whether local education authorities "may" or "shall" give extended facilities in certain cases.

MR. HARWOOD said it was just the question of "may" or "may not" that would dislocate local affairs at elections; it would bring in the element of religion to dominate all other questions. The Minister for Education might say that he had brought the right of appeal into this clause, as he had done into an earlier clause. But there was a serious difference. In the first case, the matter was primarily one of administration; here it was a matter of principle, and it was for Parliament to settle matters of principle. The provision which the right hon. Gentleman offered in regard to contracting out filled him with amazement. Those who cared for national education must view with alarm the prospect of a number of schools going outside the national system. Why should they have a Bill at all, if they were to nullify it by allowing schools to go outside? Moreover, the treatment which was to be given to those schools seemed to him to be cruel. He was not pleading the cause of the Roman Catholic school or of any particular class of schools, but it seemed to him to be a monstrous thing to put a penalty on the teaching of religion. That was how it would appear to the public. It was as if Parliament were saying: "If you teach this kind of religion we will put a ban on you." Passive resistance! Why, in Bolton for thirty-two years the Roman Catholics, the poorest part of the population, kept up their own schools at their own expense and paid the School Board rate without a murmur. The members of the Government were being troubled by resistance of another kind from their own supporters, and he thought one of the causes of that was that they had condoned too much passive resistance. It was not for this House, which was the maker of laws, to treat lightly those who had disobeyed the law. It was not for this House to turn round on these poor people, who for thirty years had obeyed the law, although it was cruel to them, by paying rates for schools to which they could not possibly send their children, and say to them: "If you persist in teaching your religion we will put a ban on you, turn you into the wilderness, and put a mark upon you." That was surely not the way this House should treat the relationship of religion to the great problem of education. The clause unamended would be a most unfortunate thing for local government, and for municipal enterprise, and certainly he would oppose it.

*MR. CHARLES ROBERTS (Lincoln) said he spoke as a friend of Clause 4 in principle, though exception might be taken to its details. He thought the clause could be defended on grounds of principle, and a word of thanks was due to the Government for having met the representations made to them inside and outside the House by allowing an appeal to the Board of Education. They were not dealing here with single school districts. In such single school districts there were, he knew, some Roman Catholic schools; but these he understood the Roman Catholics did not propose to maintain on their present denominational basis. Under this clause they were dealing with urban districts where there was a choice of schools, and where it was possible without sacrificing educational efficiency to grant concession. In those urban districts under the clause it was to be an absolute condition that there should be public school accommodation for other children. The Clause 4 school would not be the old denominational school as it was known in the past. Under the old system the denominational school had a monopoly of a district in which there were children of mixed creeds. The new Clause 4 school would not have a monopoly. It would be an option or an alternative. The denominational school under Clause 4 was a single-religion school. It was a school which could not exist unless there was accommodation for children who belonged to other creeds. Although he admitted that the Clause 4 school might be under clerical influence, it was under popular management and control. He thought that that was a clear difference, and that, therefore, they might give extended facilities under the clause. Nevertheless the Government had gone far enough in granting the appeal to the Board of Education. They all knew that there might be local authorities who would not allow the rates to go to denominational schools; and they did not get rid of the difficulty if the clause was made mandatory. They were dealing with authorities, some of whom might be pig-headed, and might fight the clause in other ways that plainly occurred to him; and it would not get rid of the difficulty to substitute "shall" for "may." Then in the last resort the Board of Education had the power of mandamus. The hon. Member for Bolton had said that this was a matter which ought to be taken entirely out of the hands of the local education authorities; but that could not be done, because there were questions of accommodation, structure, sanitation, and what children were to be considered as children attending the schools—all these questions had in any case to be placed in the hands of the local education authorities. It would be far better, in his opinion, to trust in the first instance to the localities and to submit the adjustment of these facilities to justice and reason, rather than for the House of Commons to thrust this clause down the throats of the local authorities, whether they wanted it or not. After all, they were all anxious to get to a peaceful settlement of this unending religious wrangling, and many of those on his own side of the House would welcome concession, which would, without sacrificing fundamental principles, make for peaceful settlement. He did not know whether he had read the Amendment rightly, but in his view the contracting-out arrangement would rarely occur, and it would be a remedy adopted in the last resort. It would only apply to a fraction of a fraction of the schools. He did not believe that any great breach in our national system of education would be made in leaving these occasional and exceptional powers over this mere residuum of schools in the hands of the President of the Board of Education. He did not see much harm in a few experiments being made in that direction, but he regarded contracting-out as a temporary expedient—it was only going to last five years—during which period religious party passions would have time to cool down.

Mr. SAMUEL ROBERTS (Sheffield, Ecclesall) said he was quite sure that the Minister for Education could not but have been moved by the appeal made by the noble Lord the Member for Chichester and by speaker after speaker, in behalf of the poor Catholics in this country. He himself was an Evangelical Churchman, but he hoped he had toleration to those who differed from him, and who wished to do justice to their own feelings and to their own schools. If they said it was necessary to have more extended facilities than were given to them in Clause 3, he thought they ought to be given. The noble Lord the Member for Chichester had said that half of the Catholic schools would be destroyed under the Bill. Surely that was a serious matter. He thought that if a Church wished that religious instruction should be imparted for more than two days in the week it should be given. He himself was a manager of a Church school, and he believed that the general practice in the Church of England schools at the present time was that special religious teaching was only given for one half hour in the week. He had gone into schools to find out what was being taught, and had heard the children being taught to do their duty towards God and to their neighbour according to the Church Catechism—teaching which, formerly, no Nonconformist would have been unwilling to listen to. He knew that there were Catholics and some Anglicans and Jews who were willing to go further than he would, and there was no doubt that in some centres the existing religious teaching would not be sufficient. At the present moment he did not think we had strife in our local authorities. On the contrary he knew from his own experience they had peace reigning within them. Why should they disturb that peace by bringing in these sectarian and religious differences at every municipal election? If the proposal of the Government were adopted it would introduce into local elections that strife which they all wished to avoid. He was sure the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues wished to be fair and to do justice in the case of all schools. They should therefore endeavour to do justice to the Roman Catholic schools. Such an appeal came, he thought, with much more force from a Member who, like himself, was opposed to every doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church, and to the extreme doctrines of the Church of England, than it would do from those interested.

*Mr. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said the Bill did not apply to Ireland and did not affect his constituency, but he could not help expressing an opinion upon the question, because he thought that an exaggerated view had been taken on both sides. Taking Clause 4, and dealing for a moment with it from the Nonconformist attitude, the President of the Board of Education had declared that he meant to make the extended facilities for special religious instruction a reality. Accepting, therefore, the idea that it was going to be made operative on a large scale, if that were so, what was the overwhelming reason against it being made mandatory? He took the Nonconformist position because they were going to vote for the clause upon an assurance that it was going to be made a reality. But if the Government meant this clause to be a reality, and if they knew that it was going to be a reality, whatever they did in that Committee, surely the issue at stake from that standpoint was a very small one indeed. That was what made him say that he thought exaggerated views had been taken of this clause. He was going to vote for the Amendment, although he did not distrust the local authorities of this country. He had had a great deal to do with them. For five years he was at the Local Government Board and therefore knew something about the subject, but anybody who was acquainted with England knew that there were not only local authorities who were pig-headed and who gave a great deal of trouble to the central authority, but a great many local authorities were not only pig-headed but bigoted. There was nothing a Department would shrink from more than mandamusing a great local authority, or in fact any local authority. He remembered the Local Government Board mandamusing the Leicester Board of Guardians about vaccination. He remembered how much they shrank from it, and how they were driven from point to point, how they were glad to give it the go by, and how in the end the whole proceedings ended in smoke. The mandamusing of a local authority could not be done with impunity, and if it came to that on a large scale the working of the Act would be wrecked. The Government drew this clause with the avowed intention of meeting the susceptibilities of the Roman Catholic and the Jew, and they had to include the Anglican. If the Government meant, as they had said, that the clause should be a reality, that it should not be illusory, what reason could there be against making it mandatory? To throw this question into municipal elections all over England would be one of the worst things the House of Commons could do.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Wexford, N.) said they had now reached the crucial point of the Bill, and the matter was of such importance to those whom he represented that he felt he must trespass upon the time of the Committee. While recognising the honesty of the intention of the Minister for Education, he expressed the fear that, in endeavouring to reconcile the various conflicting interests concerned in this question. the right hon. Gentleman was attempting to do the impossible by the means he proposed. The only way of dealing with the problem was by adopting a policy of equality all round, of letting each sect teach its children in its own way. It was of no use to say that the State could not afford to give religious teaching, because in his view it was the first duty of the State to see that the children of the community were brought up with proper religious teaching and that no portion of the children of its citizens were neglected or damnified in any way by the system of education it undertook. Some hon. Members had spoken for local authorities and were entitled to do so because they were members of local authorities themselves. On the whole, however, he did not think that the local authority point of view had been properly dealt with. He did not think there was any distinction between English and Irish local authorities; the Irish local authority was very much in the same position as the English local authority. Many of his hon. friends and himself had been involved in local affairs, and he himself had taken part in every form of local authority which existed in Ireland. He thought that in the interests of the local authorities themselves this clause ought to be made mandatory. If the local authorities throughout the country were canvassed, and asked, not from a platform, but in their committees, what they felt, he believed they would agree that the last thing they desired to see was local elections influenced by religious discussions. After all, Parliament ought to have the courage of its convictions, and if it meant this clause to be a reality it ought to say so. It ought to say that the provision of this clause should be carried into effect, in order to save the local authorities the trouble of fighting election after election upon religious or sectarian lines. He was very much struck by the objection which some hon. Members seemed to take to the proposal that the local authority should pay the rent of the schools which they were to take over. In his country that rent would be paid in respect of property which had been created by the labour and self-sacrifice of the poorest part of the population. He was referring to the schools created by the labours and sacrifices of the Catholic population. If in Great Britain the Government said that they intended to acquire the property of these Roman Catholics they were bound in common honesty to pay for it. He looked on the proposal for contracting-out as a dangerous one for Catholic schools. The salaries of teachers had been raised, the condition of the schools had been improved, and the expenses of education were not likely to diminish in the future. Schools which contracted-out might accordingly find it difficult to satisfy the authorities, and might run the risk of being closed on the ground that they were not properly carried on. Catholics were not responsible for the educational disturbance of the last few years, and he hoped they would not be made to suffer in consequence of it.

*MR. HART-DAVIES (Hackney, N.) thought the whole of the debate was one more illustration of the difficulties which were created when the Government got away from the clear path of principle. It was a matter of hopeless difficulty to combine denominational teaching with public control. Contracting-out was, he thought, a step in the right direction, although he did not think it proceeded upon proper lines inasmuch as it was made a question of an order of the Board of Education instead of a question of the wishes of the trustees or managers of schools. Although he did not often find himself in agreement with the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, he agreed with every word the right hon. Gentleman had said on this subject. He was sure it was the only logical and satisfactory solution. It was impossible to carry on an efficient system of education if a large section of the community had a rankling sense of grievance, as he believed under this section they would have.

*MR. J. RAMSAY MACDONALD said whether they voted for Clause 4 or against it, in favour of "may" or of "shall," or for or against various Amendments that had been put upon the Paper by the Government, they would find themselves in a difficulty. Those for whom he spoke did not accept this Bill as being a satisfactory solution of the religious difficulty. They supported strenuously the proposal of the hon. Member for Burnley, which they considered at the time laid down a basis upon which a satisfactory educational superstructure could be erected. They were enormously out-voted. They saw the difficulties which followed from the magnificent beating they got on that occasion. He was painfully aware that to talk of logic and of rational conclusion in connection with this topic would meet with the severe disapprobation of some of his hon. friends opposite. Nevertheless, the fact remained that every Member of this House who voted against them on that particular occasion voted in favour of Clause 4. He had been exceedingly amused by some of the speeches which Nonconformists spokesmen had delivered to-day. If the country were entirely Nonconformist he could understand those speeches. There would in that case be common sense and practical wisdom in an hon. Member assuring the House that nobody could object to the Bill as it stood. Clause 4 was a reasonable and necessary corollary of the principle on which this Bill was founded. There were only two possible ways of dealing with the religious question in connection with elementary education. One was to say that as the State was a secular organisation—which, of course, was the Protestant view of the State—it could only concern itself with the secular aspect of education. That was the view taken by him and his friends, but it was a view that had been rejected by an overwhelming majority. The only other way of dealing with the question, therefore, was to apply the principle of toleration. The principle of toleration was not to lay down what was called the greatest common ground occupied by all sects; that was merely tipping the scale in favour of the sect which laid the least emphasis upon denominational instruction. He was sorry that any sect should lay great emphasis upon denominational instruction, but he was not there to take any part but that of a judge, so far as one possibly could, and to weigh as impartially as possible both sides of the question. The principle of toleration meant the recognition of the existence of separate denominations which did not and could not agree as to what were the essential principles of Christianity. If every sect said simple Bible teaching was the foundation upon which they built their particular sectarian edifice then it would be altogether unreasonable and illogical for the representatives of those sects to say that Clause 4 was a necessary corollary of the debates and divisions upon Clause 1. But that was not a correct description of the religious state of the country, and therefore the application of the principles of toleration to religion could not possibly be satisfied by the Bill. Having voted as so many hon. Members did the other day, they were bound to say that so far as they reasonably could they had to recognise the right of denominations to retain their schools, and appoint, at any rate, the headmasters of those schools in order to retain their religious atmosphere. The Committee were bound to see that in giving effect to the principle of toleration they did not reduce the efficiency of the education given in the denominational schools. He thought the Committee would be perfectly unanimous that they could not give effect to the principle in any way which would reduce the efficiency of education. Therefore the Committee were bound to reject the Amendment allowing certain schools to contract themselves out of the operation of the Bill. They could not give effect to this principle of toleration by allowing premises to be used as a schoolhouse if unfitted for that purpose, and they had already safeguarded themselves against that; and the Board of Education had powers quite apart from the Bill under which they could reject such premises. So far as the Bill was drafted it gave them all the safeguards from an educational point of view that were necessary, and then it imposed the simple mechanical test that if four-fifths of the children attending a particular schools asked, by means of a secret ballot, that that school should be denominational, the local authority might accede to their request. The question was, Ought this to be left in the hands of the local authority? He was not going to reason from the special point of view of any denomination. He wanted to consider the matter from a political point of view, because that was the view he and his friends were more interested in than the religious aspect of the question. They might just as well draft a Factory Bill and provide that the local authorities should do certain things and then stipulate that those provisions of the Factory law which were placed under the control of the local authorities should come into operation only if the local authoriries so decided. Any such stipulation would immediately bring the law into absolute chaos, and the House would at once object to any local authorities having such a power. What they were laying down in Clause 4 was that denominational schools followed as a necessary consequence on the basis of the Bill as drafted. They were laying down as part of civil rights that under certain circumstances a certain proportion of parents should be able to claim certain privileges for their children. It was not a question of expediency, it was a question of denominations that differed from the great majority of the people of the country. If that was not the position, Clause 4 ought never to have been included.

But, if the meaning he put on the general idea and the consequence of that idea was embodied in the Bill, then he said this was not a question of local self-government, it was a question of a declaration on the part of the legislative authority of the country that such and such should be the civil right of the parents, and under certain conditions that civil right should be mechanically recognised on the part of the administrative authorities created by the Bill. He could not conceive for a moment of any theory of local self-government which demanded that this question should be handed over for final settlement to the local authority. It was not a question of local administration. Why should the education authority in his own constituency declare that no special facilities should be given, and the education authority of an adjoining constituency say that they should be given? Surely the clause did not lay down a clear principle of law in such a way as to gain for it the confidence of the denominations which they were asking to remain passive and administer the Bill in a fair-minded way. He and his friends also looked at the matter from another point of view. They had hon. Members on town councils or county councils, and there was one thing they were keenly alive to, namely, the introduction of sectarian strife into the contests for efficient local administration. He could assure hon. Members that that was going to continue if the clause was left in its optional form. Those hon. Members who had gone through local elections would agree with the view he had expressed. [" No."] Surely Members must have a vivid recollection of school board elections, and the municipal elections that followed the Bill of 1902. Hon. Members must surely pause before they said they were prepared to face municipal elections after this Bill became law, when the first thing a local authority was to be asked to do was to decide whether Clause 4 should be put into operation or not. Were they prepared to face such elections when this question would be put in the forefront of the considerations that would influence the voting at such elections? Did they seriously imagine that the principles of sound municipal administration were going to be the main considerations in these elections? There was another point. Even if they left the clause optional and inserted provisions enabling the Board of Education to intervene if it found it desirable or necessary so to do, they were opening the doors for serious conflict between the Board of Education and some local authorities. Opinions would differ as to how great was that risk, but surely they had Wales as an example to warn them in that direction, and he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's, Hanover Square, as to the great temptation that would be placed in the way of local authorities to take the line of least resistance, a most objectionable course from the point of view of sound and efficient education. He did not look forward with any degree of pleasure or hope or expectation to the methods by which local education authorities would have to decide whether or not this or that school should be taken over, or whether special facilities should be given, and following that, an appeal to the Board of Education and an inquiry and possibly a decision against the local authority. He thought it very likely that local authorities, knowing that reference could be made to the Board of Education, would be inclined, as a matter of convenience and policy, to refuse to give these special facilities. It was in fact an invitation to the local authorities to refuse these facilities in the first instance and refer the whole question to the Board of Education. One could easily imagine that expedient being made an election cry in certain places. Candidates would pledge themselves to refer the matter to the Board for final decision, and he thought such candidates would be credited with being cute electioneerers. That was not a desirable position to occupy, and therefore he was going to vote for the clause being made mandatory. If that was defeated he would undoubtedly support the Government Amendments with the exception of that which gave the schools power to contract out of the Bill. He regretted that the very simple and straightforward word "shall" was not introduced into the first clause, for that would have given the Catholics and the Church some guarantee that toleration was going to be exercised, which was not the case so far as this Bill was concerned.

MR. LLEWELLYN WILLIAMS (Carmarthen District) assured the Government that they would have the undivided support of the vast majority of their supporters if they were prepared to stick to their Bill and to their Amendments. It was not a question whether their followers were willing to support the Government; it was a question whether the Government were willing to support their own Bill. In the last few days the Members who had been most vocal on the Liberal side were those who opposed the Government, but he asked the Government not merely to regard the views of those Members, but also to regard the views of those who silently followed the Government into the Division Lobby. He was one of those who supported the secular Amendment and he regretted ever since that more Members had not had the courage of their opinions to support that solution. It was the logical and inevitable solution, but the Government had not accepted it. The Bill had been built on the principle of local option. Clause 4 as it stood gave the local authority the option to give extended facilities, and he urged the Government, as they had after mature thought introduced a Bill based on the principle of local option, not to allow themselves to be bullied out of that position or to be blandished out of it by speeches made on either side of the House. The hon. Member for the Chichester Division had said that 50 per cent. of the Catholic schools would be destroyed by Clause 4. Nothing surprised him more than to hear that reiterated.

MR. DILLON: Clause 4 leaves 50 per cent. of the Catholic schools outside its operation.

MR. LLEWELLYN WILLIAMS: Does the hon. Member mean to say that if 50 per cent. do not come within the operation of Clause 4 they will not come within the operation of Clause 3?

MR. DILLON: Clause 3 is no use to us at all.

MR. LLEWELLYN WILLIAMS said that was another matter. If a school could not be brought within the conditions of Clause 4 he contended there was nothing to prevent its being brought within Clause 3. That was not the extinction of denominational teaching in this country. As to contracting out, if he thought it would be used by the Board of Education indiscriminately or that its powers would be evoked to a large extent, he would view it with great apprehension. But he did not conceive that anything of that kind would happen. He assured the Irish Members that the Welsh Members, who represented the greatest body of Nonconformists in this country, only asked that local option should be allowed them because they had not got a Parliament of their own to decide what they wanted.

MR. DILLON: We are going to support your part of the Bill.

MR. LLEWELLYN WILLIAMS said he was glad to hear that, but that dealt with only a small part of the Home Rule question. If this clause was made mandatory a greater flame would be kindled in Wales than the present Government would be able to put out. But if local option was allowed, if they trusted the local authorities in Wales, the Bill would work smoothly and well. Someone had said: suppose there was a pig-headed authority. No one knew better than he did that things were done during the last three or four years, both in Wales and outside it, which in their sober and calmer moments none of them would like to justify. There was a state of war, and the Welsh Coercion Act as it was called was passed against the protest of Welsh Members and he was sorry that the Irish Members voted for it.

MR. DILLON: I never did.

MR. LLEWELLYN WILLIAMS: Some of the Irish Party did. The Coercion Act was passed to coerce these people into doing what they did not want to do. This Bill could not be passed without the consent of the vast majority of the Liberal Members. It had met with the approval of the President of the Board of Trade, who was the greatest nationalist leader they had yet produced, and a Bill that was supported by him was not to be flouted by the Welsh authorities. The Bill would go to the constituencies in a different way from that of 1902 and it would go with greater sanction behind it. He asked hon. Members who were interested in Clause 4 and the provision it made for the voluntary schools within the four-fifths area, to trust the people to do the right thing, and not to try to coerce them. That was the real argument in favour of leaving the clause as it stood. He agreed that contracting out was nominally, at all events, a breach of Clause 1 of the Bill. Let him remind hon. Members of what happened in Scotland. The Scottish system, if he was rightly informed, was precisely the sort of system which was proposed by the Government in this Bill. Local option was given. [AN HON. MEMBER: No.] Let him explain what he meant. He understood that the local authorities could appoint if they liked Catholic teachers, and he was told that where there was a vast predominance of Catholic children such teachers were so appointed. There was not one uniform system of schools in Scotland, for he believed that one-tenth of them were outside the national system. He did not believe that contracting-out would be operative in more than a few cases; indeed, not at all in Wales. But he believed in the policy of justice, of trusting the people, and of leaving to each locality to decide what was best for its own community.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover) said that some remarks which fell from the last speaker were of great interest, because they showed that he, in common with other Members of the Committee, believed that this Bill did not leave anything in effect to the determination of the local authority; that the Government, in fact, did not trust the local authority. Without going over the ground already covered, let them see how Clause 4 stood. They began by giving directions to the local authorties, and said: "You are not to allow denominational schools to go on unless certain conditions are fulfilled." These conditions were:—the school had to be suitable; the area had to be an urban area; the parents in favour of the extended facilities must be in the proportion of 4 to 1 of the other parents having children at the school; there must be an alternative school in the area; the population of the area was to be 5,000; there was to be no rent; the salary of the teacher was to be paid by the denomination. So that, so far from leaving this matter to the good sense and discretion of the local authorities, the Government started by saying that the local authorities were not to recognise any one of those schools unless these seven conditions were fulfilled. He was not saying that these conditions were too numerous or too stringent. That was not the point; but if they were to have so many conditions then the whole trend of the argument was in favour of saying that if the whole of the conditions were fulfilled the denominational schools should go on. Not only, however, had all these conditions to be fulfilled before the local authorities had a word to say, but after the conditions were fulfilled three appeals were granted against their conditions in certain circumstances. One sprang from Clause 2: if the local authorities wished to give the go-by to the whole situation, then there was to be an appeal. The second was if the managers or owners offered to enter into a treaty with the local authorities to take over a school, and the latter did not wish to do so, the tribunal of appeal might say either one of two things—first, that if the conditions were fulfilled, the local authority must take over the schools, or, secondly, they might say that under certain circumstances the denominational schools were to be State-aided schools. What then were the local authorities to do if they had conscientious objections, because they might have taken a reactionary step previous to 1902, or even worse? Then as to the third appeal. Supposing the local authorities ostensibly afforded the extended facilities, but did not in practice give satisfaction in the matter, the Board of Education might spring the teachers' question. The local authorities might say: "The teachers here do not hold the religious views of the owners of the schools," and the Board of Education might then say: "This is a bad business, and we will take away the rates from that school, and only give the Parliamentary grant." But there was another set of facts. The local authorities were elected every three years; and did anybody suppose that the election would not turn in many places to a considerable extent on points arising out of the religious difficulty?

Not content with that, the Government brought in another alternative by saying that these arrangements were to be reviewed every five years so as to obtain, by ballot, the sanction of the parents of four-fifths of the children attending the schools. Thus the Government had added another election to the many existing elections, and in fifteen years they might have five ordinary local authority elections, and three by ballot, in which the religious difficulty would be prominent. All these difficulties had arisen because the Government would not have the courage to say that where the conditions, however numerous or stringent, were fulfilled, religious freedom should be accorded to those who desired that the denominational schools should be continued in practice. It had often been said that the religious difficulty was more theoretical than practical. That might be, but in practice the difficulty would remain, because it would be complicated by these new definitions, by these appeals, by these elections, and would become so acute in the districts in which it existed at present, that it would extend to other parts, and so spread bitterness all round.

MR. GEORGE WHITE (Norfolk, N.W.) said he did not think the right hon. Gentleman had added much to the enlightenment of the debate, and he confessed he did not follow the right hon. Gentleman's logic. His hon. friend the Member for Leicester, who ought to have contributed to the debate something worth listening to, was, however, influenced by his predilection for secular education. For his part he denied that the State had any right to pay for the religious education which any citizen might demand. The right hon. Member for Dover deprecated very much the sectarian strife which was likely to be engendered if the Clause now before the Committee was accepted. He (Mr. White) confessed he had no such great fear of evil resulting from the religious question being dealt with by the local authorities. Indeed he thought it might be a means of stimulating the interest of the people in education generally. It had been said that the School Board elections had been influenced by the religious question, but he knew that there were many other interests concerned which influenced those elections. He was quite certain that since 1902 education had fallen much more into the background than was the case when the school boards existed, and their elections were fought. He wished to press the point that the Bill itself was a compromise. It was not a Bill which many of them would have drawn. It was not a Bill which, in its essence, represented the views of Nonconformists, although it had been asserted that such was the case. If it had been a Bill for the establishment of a really national system of education, and if the Bill had abolished all denominational schools, there might have been something to be said for it. But it was a compromise on the part of the Government to do something for education. It had been with some little reluctance that many of them had found the Minister for Education making one concession after another, in the best possible spirit, but a spirit he was bound to say which had not been reciprocated by hon. Gentlemen opposite. He confessed he did not understand why hon. Gentlemen opposite were so unwilling to put themselves into the hands of the local authorities, being sure that where the conditions existed which demanded a Roman Catholic school such a school would be granted. The Bill was in principle a local option measure, and he was strongly opposed to making the clause mandatory. It seemed to him contrary to the spirit of the Constitution that religion should be made in any sense mandatory. As a last resort in very peculiar circumstances he was prepared to support the contracting-out clause, and he thought the other provisions in the Government Amendments would commend themselves to the majority of the Committee. They were an honest and reasonable attempt to meet conflicting interests, and enabled him and those who thought with him to accept the clause in a way they could not otherwise have done. As to rent, he would remind hon. Gentlemen opposite that they were acquiring really better terms than under the 1902 Act. The ballot was a satisfactory way of ascertaining the opinion of the parents. They knew under what circumstances numbers of petitions were sent up to the House, how they were prepared under great misrepresentation and misunderstanding. The ballot would be a safeguard to both parents and local authorities against such evils as he had alluded to. The fact that the Bill did not suit either Party might be taken as a proof that the Government had hit on a happy medium.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland) said that n discussing the Amendment he could not without violating the rules of order allude to some of the points in regard to the whole clause with which they on the Irish Benches were most shocked. He could not accept what had been said about the 5,000 limit. If that limit were retained he was informed that 50 per cent. of the Catholic schools in England would be excluded from this clause. [" No."] He was in a better position than the hon. Gentlemen who said "No" to know that that would be the result; and if it were really true that by the limitations of this clause 50 per cent. of the Catholic schools would be excluded, he could not believe that the right hon. Gentleman would be a party to such an act of injustice. Therefore it would be no consolation to them to know that the third clause might be made applicable to these schools. He repeated that about 50 per cent., or nearly 500 schools out 1,043 would be excluded under Clause 4, if this limitation was persisted in. He did not say that anybody contemplated an act of injustice, and he was not prepared to dissent from the proposal that the local authorities would be fair and just generally. Accepting the view, however, that local authorities were generally tolerant, he desired protection against the intolerant things which it had been admitted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carnarvon might be done in a state of war, but which would not be done in cool blood. He accepted the analogy, but when they came to deal with questions of religion, one was never certain when one was in a state of war, especially if the question was mixed up with practical considerations. They knew, for instance, that in one great district of England teachers were penalised by a reduction of 10 per cent. in their salaries because they did not give religious instruction; that, he considered, to be an intolerable grievance and constituted a grave danger to the Catholic schools which afforded secular education. Distinctions were made if the parents of children preferred that they should go to a Catholic instead of to a Protestant school. There had been cases in Wales, such for instance as that at Barry, in which fuel had been refused for the purposes of denominational schools to which the majority of the members of the local authority were opposed. While accepting the statement that these things were done in a state of war, surely they ought to protect themselves against this state of things. In regard to local option a very small local option was left in this Bill. Had hon. Members read the Law Reports in The Times? Did they not know that at this very time the Minister for Education was applying for a mandamus to compel a Yorkshire local authority to do that which in his opinion ought to be done? Whatever was the cause at issue between the West Riding and the Minister for Education — his right hon. friend was on one side and the local authority was on the other. That being so, his right hon. friend had to go to the court to get a mandamus. In view of that it was rather too much to ask them to accept the theory that local bodies under all circumstances and at all times might be trusted to do what was right. It was said that the local authorities ought to be left with discretion, but his answer was that there were certain fundamental liberties which ought not to be at the mercy of any imperial or local authority, and one of these was religious equality. If it were the opinion of this Committee that the Catholics, the Jews, and the Anglicans who fulfilled the conditions of the Bill should be allowed this religious equality, then they ought to make that the subject of statute law, and not leave it to the caprice or the goodwill of the local authority. The question of the rent was one of those small petty niggling acts which very often created a great deal more resentment than more important things. Religious equality meant exactly the same position for the schools of the Catholics as for the schools of the Nonconformists, and if they devote-voted rates and taxes to the teaching of what they might call undenominational Christianity, but what Catholics called Protestantism, he could not understand the consistency and logic of denying the rent to a Catholic school because Catholic instead of Protestant doctrine was taught in it. These Catholic schools appealed to him and to every educationist as the schools of the poorest, and if any inequality was to exist it should not be in favour of the schools of the better-to-do classes. It was all very well for the representatives of some of the great Nonconformist bodies to speak of the withholding of this rent as no grievance when the members of those bodies need not send their children to these elementary schools unless they liked. They could send them to a grammar school or a private school; but the parents of the children who went to the Catholic schools were too poor to do that. It was almost the worst act of the great Irish tragedy that the people of the Irish race who had come to England or Scotland had to take the unhealthiest work and the work which involved the greatest drudgery and was the worst paid. These were the people whom it was proposed to penalise by withholding the rent, and, what was more, to contract them out of the Act. He regarded contracting-out, and still more to be contracted-out, as a reactionary step. There had never been an instance in this country of a Catholic school once established having been surrendered. He might well appeal not to the generosity, but to the justice of tolerant, fair-minded men. The proposal was that if a local authority could not be persuaded or bullied into taking these schools they should be contracted out. That meant ill-paid teachers and ill-ventilated schools. There was no class which could bear these disadvantages less than the people for whom he spoke. He hoped that the majority in this House would rise above Party, and see that the rights of these people were respected.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said there was one peculiarity which must have struck the Minister for Education. The right hon. Gentleman, like the mover of the Amendment, desired that this clause might be a reality, and he had put down Amendments of his own to achieve that object. He desired, like the mover of the Amend ment, that no voluntary school which fulfilled the general conditions of the clause should by the action of a local authority be excluded from the advantages which he wanted to give it. But whom had he found to defend his proposition? The only gentleman in the House who had risen to defend the Government and to speak against the Amendment was the hon. Member for the Morley Division of Yorkhire who had spoken in favour of local option, and local option was no longer the Government policy in regard to this clause. Therefore, the only gentlemen who had spoken against the Amendment differed fundamentally from the policy which the Government desired to carry out by the Amendments they had put upon the Paper. He thought it was one of the most singular incidents of a Parliamentary debate he had ever known that the only defenders of the Government were those who differed from the Government's policy. They had not to-day to concern themselves with the gentlemen who were in favour of local option, but to compare the two alternative methods which were now before the Committee. There was, firstly, the proposition of his hon. friend, the perfectly simple, direct, and intelligible proposition that a local authority which, according to the Government, ought to give these facilities was to be obliged by the Act to give them. That was a plain, straightforward, honest, direct, and intelligible way. It did not commend itself to the Government; and what they had got to do was to compare this plain and simple method with the tortuous, ambiguous, and, he thought, wholly unjustifiable plan which the Government had put before them in the Amendments the right hon. Gentleman had explained, but, if he would allow him to say so, not defended in the speech which he had addressed to the Committee. The first criticism he had to make was that the Government proposal aimed at taking the responsibility off the local authority, which they agreed was not in all cases to be trusted, and handing it over to the Education Department. But was the Education Department to be wholly trusted in these matters? Some hon. Gentlemen had talked of the Education Department as if it were, necessarily, a judicial body, absolutely to be trusted to decide, without respect to Party prejudice, religious opinion, or political opinion, questions which by hypothesis were tearing asunder public opinion in some constituencies. Was the Board of Education, even in the opinion of the head of the Department himself, a judicial body of that kind? And if it were a judicial body under the right hon. Gentleman himself, had the Committee the smallest security that it was going to remain a judicial body under the right hon. Gentleman's successors, from whatever party they might be drawn? The drafting of the clause made it obligatory that there should be a revision of these arrangements every five years. Every five years some Minister for Education—and he could not think the right hon. Gentleman desired to be Minister for Education for more than five years—had got to revise all these arrangements. Was there the smallest probability, or any reasonable hope, in the absence of statutory directions or any clear indication of what the policy of Parliament was, that the right hon. Gentleman or his successors would look at these difficult problems in the pure, dry light of justice? The right hon. Gentleman himself, in one of his speeches, indicated this exact weakness, and deprecated responsibilities being thrown either on himself, or upon his successors, or upon the Department, which, in a number of cases, must bring him and them into collision with bitter divisions of religious opinion, and, it might be, even with bitter differences of political opinion. That was the first objection to the Government's proposal to which the plan of his hon. friend was not open. The second objection was that the Government plan was clumsy beyond expression. They set up in Clause 4, as originally drafted, the most elaborate machinery, and all that was, or might be, doubled in any particular case by the Amendment of the Government, because the Government, or the Education Department, had got to revise the decisions come to by all this elaborate machinery, and, for the life of him, he could not see how a decision arrived at by that machinery could be upset unless they first put in operation machinery not less elaborate and not less complicated. All that had to be done in order to carry out an object which his hon. friend would accomplish by the change of a single word in the clause. It was a curious thing that the Government were not content with substituting an unsafe tribunal for a safe direction of the House of Commons and establishing clumsy machinery, but must needs accompany it with this amazing clause about rent. He did not think the provision had been defended by any one except the Member for North Camberwell, who, in the course of a speech, with much of which he agreed, made an apology for this kind of rent. He did not himself think any apology was possible. This was the second instance of what appeared to have become an habitual proceeding with the Government. The Government were driven by argument to concede something to the voluntary schools. They made a concession on Clause 2, and they were now making what they regarded as a concession on Clause 4. In each case they appeared to have thought that they would conciliate their Nonconformist supporters by putting a pecuniary fine upon those whose religious convictions they were endeavouring to satisfy. In the first case they said they would carry out their deliberate pledges, but as the price of their fidelity to their own promises would require that every owner of a private school as well as of a trust deed school should hand over that school to the local authority if required. Now the Committee had the second case. What relation could the most ingenious dialectician in the House suggest between an arrangement by which they were to meet the consciences of the owners and parents connected with a particular voluntary school and the rent paid for that school? What connexion could there be between making a local authority carry out what the Government said was its duty and handing over to it as a bonus for carrying out that duty the rent of some voluntary school? There was an extraordinary want of logic in these proposals which amazed him. If the Government had said from the beginning that they did not think any voluntary school ought to exact rent, he would have thought their position grossly unjust. But they would have said, "We have a majority and we mean to take the school." But to bring this forward as if it had some connection with satisfying the conscience of schools intended to be benefited by Clause 4 was a thing which no man could justify, and which the Minister of Education had thrown upon the Committee without a word of explanation or justification. He considered it not only extremely petty and unreasonable, but he ventured to think it would have consequences of a very serious character. The object of the Government, it was said, was to induce the local bodies to carry out their admitted functions

Why did the Government put into their Amendment every inducement to the local authority to ignore the obligations which they said ought to be obeyed? If his hon. friend's Amendment were carried the local authorities would have no alternative between dealing fairly by Clause 4 or breaking the law directly. But the Government had literally bribed the local authority by their Amendments not to carry out the policy which they said the local authority were bound to carry out. First there was the rent. If the local authorities did not come to an arrangement with the voluntary schools they would be relieved of paying the rent and of repairing the schools. They would therefore have a direct pecuniary motive for quarrelling with the managers of voluntary schools and either refusing to make an arrangement with them or refusing to make an arrangement which they could work tolerably, so that the voluntary schools would beg the Education Department that they might be relieved of this unnatural alliance and allowed, even at the cost of inefficiency and poverty, to be placed in a position of something like liberty. But the bribe to the local authority was not merely a money bribe. Everybody knew that the Government had got themselves into a great mess over Clause 4, because that clause, whether in its new or in its old form, required that the man who had been a passive resister since 1902 should go on resisting passively to the end of time. In every area in which a voluntary school was kept going at the expense of the rates every conscientious passive resister was bound to continue to uphold his principles. There was no loophole from that embarrassing situation under Clause 4 as it originally stood. But a loophole would be provided if every voluntary school within an area in which there was a passive resister was driven by the local authority to become a State-aided school. Then and then only would the conscientious passive resister be at peace; then and then only would he be justified in obeying the laws of his country. He would no longer allow his goods to be restrained, even if he had no kind friend to relieve him from that obligation. Everybody would admit that that was a strong temptation to the local authority to drive or exclude every voluntary school out of the educational system of the country. As it rested with the local authority alone to decide whether or not a voluntary school should be paid out of the rates or entirely out of the taxes, who could doubt that in places where there was a passive resister—places, for instance, like the West Riding of Yorkshire and Wales—the local authority would without hesitation choose the course which relieved them of this difficulty of their own conscience and that of their friends at the price of the efficiency of the school? He confessed he wholly agreed with the hon. Member for North Camberwell that the contracting-out clause was a retrograde clause. Never had he heard such warm eulogies of the Act of 1902, even from the supporters of the Act, as he had heard that night from the Ministerial Benches; and never had he so fully realised the truth of the opinion he had always been bold enough to entertain that that Act was a great and permanent educational measure as when he heard it admitted with such frankness that night. The hon. Member for North Camberwell had always been consistent in that view, but the significant thing was that no one on the Ministerial Benches had ventured to contradict the hon. Gentleman. No one could deny that to allow any school now supported out of the rates and taxes to be henceforth aided out of taxes alone was a retrograde step, from the point of view of secular education, and thoroughly and completely reactionary. It not only put the schools back into the position they occupied before 1902, but it emphasized that evil by bringing them down from the high position to which the Act of 1902 had raised them. The Government solution of the great religious difficulty was to turn well-equipped schools into ill-equipped schools by compelling them to give up the advantages of the rates which were conferred upon them by the Act of 1902. Surely that was one of the most grotesque results of the fortnight's debates on the Bill. It was in the fullest sense in direct contradiction to the most emphatic promises and pledges given by the right hon. Gentleman himself. They all had fresh in their minds the speech made on the introduction of the Bill which had raised so many hopes that had been already dashed to the ground. ["No."] It raised among other hopes the hope, indeed the certainty, that wherever the owners of denominational schools desired the system of denominational teaching to be continued it would be continued subject to the restrictions in Clause 3. The Government promised that on the First Reading, but they now attempted to give a different interpretation to their unmistakable pledge. Might he remind the right hon. Gentleman of what he said? The right hon. Gentleman said—

> "That after the appointed day no elementary school should receive a penny of public money, either from the rates or taxes, unless it becomes a provided school within the meaning of the Education Act. Unless electoral pledges were fustian and fudge, unless they were mere sound and fury signifying nothing, no one man could ignore that."

Was there a man in the House who could interpret the right hon. Gentleman's explicit statement in any other sense than this, that henceforth every public elementary school was to be, in the first place, under public management, and, in the second place, to receive aid out of rates as well as out of taxes? Could there be a clearer renunciation of the idea that there were to be what were now called Stated-aided schools — schools entirely outside the general system of the county schools which were to subsist or starve, as the case might be, upon taxes, and taxes alone, which were to have no connection with the local authority either by way of control or assistance, which were not to receive a single penny out of the rates. That was for ever to be abolished. ["Hear, hear," from the Chancellor of the Exchequer.] Did he understand the cheer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as indicating that the Government viewed that policy with satisfaction? The right hon. Gentleman adopted a prudent reticence. At all events, the reported and corrected words of the Members of the Government indicated that they never contemplated, when they brought in the Bill, any such class of school as State-aided schools, but that they deliberately thought they were introducing a reform which went further than the Act of 1902, not, indeed, in giving more rate aid, but in giving public control over the schools. One word by way of summing up. The Government found among those who were going to support the Amendment only those who were in favour of local option. Those who were in favour of local option were, indeed, opposed to the Amendment, but they were equally opposed to the policy of the Government. They were quite opposed to the policy of the Government. They relied, therefore, upon the somewhat hollow support of those who fundamentally differed from them in the object to be attained. In the object to be attained there was no difference between the Government and his hon. friend. His hon. friend proposed a clear and straightforward method of dealing with it. The Government method was not clear, and not straightforward—it involved the greatest injustice to voluntary schools, it carried with it the most reactionary result upon general education, and it was in direct and explicit contradiction to the promises made by the Minister for Education himself.

Mr. BIRRELL moved to report Progress.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR inquired if the Government were going to do anything else.

MR. BIRRELL replied that they intended to take nothing except the Worcester Election Petition Motion.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said it would in that case be unnecessary to divide.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress; and ask leave to sit again"—(Mr. Birrell)—put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY BILL
(BY ORDER).

Order read, for resuming adjourned debate on Question [June 19th], "That the Bill, as amended, be now considered."

Question again proposed.

*MR. MORTON (Sutherland) rose to move, "That the Bill be considered that day three months." He maintained that the railway ought to provide third-class as well as first-class sleeping carriages upon trains going north and west and travelling all night. It was said that this change would not pay, but it was a well-known and admitted fact that the profits of the railway company come from third-class passenger traffic. The third-class passengers were surely entitled to the same accommodation as the first class. They were not going to ask too much, because they knew the railway companies only had limited accommodation, but he thought the railway companies should on notice supply to the third-class passengers the same accommodation they supplied to the first class. Nor did they ask that all railways should supply this accommodation, but only the five railways travelling north and west, and those other railways connected therewith. They were obliged to deal with the matter in this way because they could not put a clause in the Bill, and therefore the only course to adopt was to move to reject the Bill. They did not want to throw it out, but he warned the railway companies and their supporters that they meant business and were determined, so far as lay in their power, to insist that all classes of His Majesty's subjects should be treated alike in both railway and other matters. And unless the company met them they would do their best to throw out the Bill whatever the consequences might be. The railway company must remember that all these concessions granted to railway companies by Parliament were not granted to them for the purpose of making money, but for the convenience of the public. He felt that the time had now arrived when Parliament ought to say that the people should be considered first and the railway shareholders afterwards. He moved the Motion standing in his name upon the Paper.

MR. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton) formally seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed.

"To leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Morton.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) said he was amazed that not a single member of the Treasury Bench had risen to reply to his hon. friend. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Essex whom he saw sitting opposite had promised to give some information at the earliest opportunity; he promised to consult the railway companies, but neither the right hon. Gentleman nor the representative of the Board of Trade had thought fit to reply to his hon. friend the Member for Sutherland. The commercial traveller was greatly interested in this question. Resolutions from all parts of the country had been passed, and it was only right that the railway companies should redress a grievance which was felt by so many. If hon. Members wanted anything done they must avail themselves of every opportunity to place their desires before the House, notwithstanding the blandishments and fair promises of the Front Bench. He waited with anxiety for some statement from the hon. Gentleman representing the Board of Trade, and unless he had something to say of a satisfactory nature he should join his hon. friend the Member for Sutherland in the stand he was taking in regard to this railway and other railways.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. KEARLEY, Devonport) said that when this matter was under discussion about a month ago he gave an undertaking that he would place himself in communication with the railway companies and represent to them what he believed to be the growing feeling in this House that some facilities should be afforded in the direction desired by his hon. friends. In pursuance of his undertaking he suggested a conference at the Board of Trade. The Great Northern Railway Company sent its general manager, who was accompanied by other representative railway men. They gave an undertaking that the general managers of all the long-distance railway companies should meet to consider the question. The consultation was now going on, not in any spirit of trying to burke the issue, but with the firm determination of arriving at some decision which would be communicated to the House. A matter of this kind could not be decided off-hand. There were many practical questions to be considered, such as the increased length of trains, the extension of platforms, and so on. It was only fair, therefore, that the railway companies should have the opportunity of fully considering the matter.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Morton and Mr. Claude Hay.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill, as amended, considered.

Amendments made.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Standing Orders 223 and 243 be suspended, and that the Bill be now read a third time."—(Chairman of Ways and Means.)

MR. MOONEY (Newry) asked an explanation why this extraordinary procedure was proposed in favour of this Bill. The Standing Orders laid down that no private Bill should get through two stages at one sitting of the House.

*MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Gentleman objects to this Motion being taken now, it must stand over.

MR. MOONEY: I do not object if there is any explanation.

MR. EMMOTT stated that this Bill had passed through all its stages in the House of Lords. The Bill had been several times postponed in this House, and it was quite usual for such facilities as he was now asking to be granted in the case of Bills which had been delayed owing to the action of the House, and through no fault of the promoters. He therefore asked the House to pass this Motion.

MR. MORTON: I object to this being taken. I do so on the ground that we have had no explanation from the railway company.

Motion accordingly opposed.

THE WORCESTER ELECTION.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL (Sir JOHN WALTON, Leeds, S.) apologised to the House for asking at that late hour for consideration of the Motion standing in his name. It only invited the House to adopt the course prescribed by Statute. He was not aware that in any previous case had any objection been made to it. He begged to move.

Question proposed, "Worcester Election—That an humble Address be presented to His Majesty, as followeth:—

"Most Gracious Sovereign,

"We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave humbly to represent to Your Majesty that Sir John Compton Lawrence, knight, one of the Justices of the High Court of Justice, and Sir Joseph Walton, knight, one of the Justices of the High Court of Justice, being two of the Judges appointed for the trial of Election Petitions, pursuant to The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, and The Parliamentary Elections and Corrupt Practices Act, 1879, have reported to the House of Commons that there was reason to believe extensive corrupt practices had taken place at the last Election for the City of Worcester.

"We therefore humbly pray Your Majesty that Your Majesty will be graciously pleased to cause inquiry to be made, pursuant to the powers of the Act of Parliament passed in the sixteenth year of the reign of Her late Majesty Queen Victoria, intituled 'An Act to provide for more effectual inquiry into the existence of Corrupt Practices at Elections for Members to serve in Parliament,' by the appointing of Edward Tindal Atkinson, esquire, one of Your Majesty's Counsel, Attorney-General for Your Majesty's County Palatine of Durham, and Recorder of Leeds; Horace Edmund Avory, esquire, also one of Your Majesty's Counsel and Recorder of Kingston-upon-Thames; and Charles Willie Matthews, esquire, Barrister at Law and Recorder of Salisbury, as Commissioners for the purpose of making inquiry into the existence of such corrupt practices."—(Mr. Attorney-General.)

Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That the said Address be communicated to the Lords, and their concurrence desired thereto. — (Mr. Attorney-General.)

And, it being after half-past Eleven of the clock, Mr. SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at ten minutes before Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, 26*th June*, 1906.

The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS informed the House that the Committee on Group I of Private Bills not being appointed to meet until Thursday next, the parties promoting the Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 9) Bill [Wanstead and Woodford Order], which was set down for consideration on the first day of the meeting of the Committee, had appeared before him and proved that the evidence of Dr. John C. Thresh, medical officer for the county of Essex, was essential to their case, and that his evidence could not be procured without the intervention of the House.

Ordered, That the said Dr. John C. Thresh do attend the Committee on Group I of Private Bills on Thursday next, at half-past Eleven of the clock.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Settlement of Isle of Lewis Cottars in Ross-shire.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): To ask the Secretary for Scotland if he will state in what districts of the mainland of Ross-shire it is proposed to settle cottars migrated from the Island of Lewis.

(Answered by Mr. Sinclair.) In 1901 inquiries were addressed to the Lewis Landward Committee upon this subject, who replied in the negative in December, 1905. Since then the Landward Committee report that there may be a prospect of some crofters or cottars being willing to migrate to the mainland. But the funds now at the disposal of the Board for purchase are very limited, and it is the opinion of the Board that, pending legislation, which the hon. Member knows is in course of preparation, no immediate steps can be taken in connection with the formation of new settlements.

Withholding of Increment due to Senior Telegraphists.

MR. C. J. O'DONNELL (Newington, Walworth): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that certain increments of salary due to senior telegraphist in the Central Telegraph Office on the April 1st, 1906, have been withheld; that the officials concerned have not been informed of the cause of their punishment, no reason, in fact, being assigned; and whether he will now let these officials know how they have been in fault, and give them an opportunity of defence before withholding the increments of salary they have earned.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The question whether the increments of certain overseers and senior telegraphists in the Central Telegraph Office can be allowed is under consideration, and I am not yet prepared to announce a decision. The officers concerned were informed in March last of the grounds on which the allowance of their increment was in doubt, and were invited to offer any explanation they might have to give.

Forcible Removal of Fishermen to Facilitate Naval Shooting Practice.

MR. MILDMAY (Devonshire, Totnes): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the attention of the Admiralty has been drawn to the action of H.M.S. "Theseus" in sending a launch to remove four fishermen from their fishing ground on the Skerries Bank in Start Bay on April 27th last, compelling them to abandon their crab pots under protest; whether their claims to compensation for loss of the day's work will be considered; and whether it will be possible to conduct the firing practice elsewhere along this coast, in view of the importance of this particular crab-pot ground to the poorer fishermen of the district.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) My attention has been drawn to the incident, and inquiries are being made, the result of which I will communicate to the hon. Member; but as the allegations of fact are conflicting there may be some little delay in clearing up the question.

Irish Land Purchase—Average Prices.

MR. P. A. MCHUGH (Sligo, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the average price in terms of years purchase paid by the Congested Districts Board for lands purchased by them in each of the years ended on March 31st, 1901, 1902, 1903, 1904, 1905, and 1906.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The average prices paid by the Congested Districts Board for lands purchased by them in each of the years ended on March 31st from 1901 to 1906 were:—

Year ended 31st March.	Number of years' purchase of first-term rents.	Number of years' purchase of second-term rents.	Number of years' purchase of yearly rents, leaseholds, &c.	Number of years' purchase of annual value of untenanted land.
1903 - - -	17	18¾	16	25½
1904 - - -	19	21	19½	28½
1905 - - -	18¾	20½	18¼	27¾
1906 - - -	18	21¼	18	29
Average price for the six years -	17¼	20	17	27¾

In this statement the number of years' purchase paid for land on all the estates bought in each year have been added together and divided by the number of estates concerned, without regard to the quantity of land bought in each estate.

Expedited Publication of South African Blue-Books.

MR. BRODIE (Surrey, Reigate): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can see his way to supply the House with Papers on South African questions at shorter intervals.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) Papers on the labour question in the Transvaal were published in December and in February, and it is proposed to issue further Papers of a general character in the course of next month. The House has been placed in possession of all the material information on the various topics to which its attention has been directed, by Questions addressed to me by hon. Members, through the medium of the Answers as well as by the statements made by me in the course of the Debates which have taken place, so that I do not think that the hon. Member can complain of lack of information. But the preparation of a new Blue-book shall be expedited.

British Policy Holders in American Insurance Companies.

Mr. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in the interests of British policy holders in American insurances, he will communicate with the United States Government Insurance Department of State, as to the recent investigations in New York respecting American insurance companies, and give report of the same and also of the laws recently passed by the New York Insurance Department for the protection of policy holders; and whether he will consider the advisability of amending the Life Insurance Act of 1870.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) As stated in my reply yesterday, a Committee of the House of Lords is now considering what steps should be taken to provide adequate security for British policy holders in America, and other assurance companies which have their chief office outside the United Kingdom, and I propose to bring the hon. Member's Question to the notice of that Committee.

Oxfordshire Pupil Teachers' Centre.

Mr. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.): To ask the President of the Board of Education whether the Board have, through their inspector, recommended that the Oxfordshire pupil teacher centre, which is under the control of the local education authority, shall be closed, that the male pupil teachers attending such centre shall be sent to the Oxford high school, and the female pupil teachers to the convent school; whether he is aware that in neither of these schools is there any laboratory; that excellent results have been secured at the centre, under a head teacher who has had experience as training college tutor and organising inspector; will he say whether this policy has received his sanction; and, if not, whether he will take steps to retain the pupil teachers in an institution under public control and free from denominational influences.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The general situation in regard to the existing pupil teacher centre, carried on by the Oxford City Council, to which, I presume, the hon. Member refers, has been brought to my notice. The facts, as known to the Board of Education, differ somewhat from the account of the case given in the Question. The centre was stated by the Board to be unsatisfactory more than two years ago, and grants were refused four months ago, in consequence of the continued failure of the local authority to improve matters. Every effort has been made by the Board to secure better provision being made by the local education authority, but so far without effective results. I understand, however, that the higher education committee of the city council have now considered the matter, and concur in the necessity of the arrangements suggested by the Board.

Sale of Lands of the Prynces Charity.

Sir WALTER FOSTER (Derbyshire, Ilkeston): To ask the hon. Member for the Elland Division of Yorkshire, as representing the Charity Commissioners, whether any application has been received from the trustees of the Prynces charity in the parish of Holme Lacy, in the county of Hereford, for authority to sell the charity lands; whether any memorial against such sale has been received, or any request for a public inquiry; and whether the Charity Commissioners will undertake to postpone the sale, if any, until a public inquiry has been held, and if such sale is allowed, to order it to be by public auction.

(Answered by Mr. Trevelyan.) The present administrators of the charity have approached the Commissioners with reference to a sale of the charity land, but they have not yet made any formal application for authority to sell, and no memorial with respect to such proposed sale, or request for a public inquiry, has been received by the Commissioners.

Working of the Teachers' Register.

Sir EDWARD SASSOON (Hythe): To ask the President of the Board of Education whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the working of the Teachers' Register contravenes the Act of 1899, by making an invidious distinction between teachers in different categories of schools, and fails to carry out the intentions of Parliament as testified to by the memorandum of the Board of Education [Cd. 3017]; and, if so, whether he contemplates rectifying this state of things, in view of the intention of His Majesty's Government to drop Clause 36 of the Education Bill.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) I have nothing to add to the reply given to a Question addressed to me by the hon. Member for Stirlingshire on this subject this afternoon, except to say that I must not be taken as endorsing the accuracy of the description of the position of affairs contained in the two paragraphs of the Question.

Exchange Compensation Allowances to European Officers of the Indian Services.

SIR SEYMOUR KING (Hull, Central): To ask the Secretary of State for India whether he will grant a Return containing copies of all the Resolutions issued by the Government of India, with regard to the grant of exchange compensation allowance to European officers of the Indian Services.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) I have no objection to the publication of a Return containing the Resolutions regarding exchange compensation allowance which have been issued by the Government of India.

Temporary Assistant Land Commissioner.

MR. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, prior to March 31st last, there is any official record of a case in which the services of a temporary Assistant Land Commissioner were dispensed with on the expiration of the period for which he had been temporarily employed, except on reduction of staff.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) There are official records of three such cases, two of which occurred in the year 1890, and one in the year 1897.

Payment of Fees for Teaching of Irish.

MR. WALTER LONG: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the proposed scheme, as recently outlined by him, for the payment of fees in respect of the teaching of Irish in national schools originated with the Board of National Education; or whether it was recommended in the first instance to the Board by the Irish Government.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) It would be contrary to the established practice to disclose any confidential communications which may have passed between the Irish Government and this or any other Board.

Dismissal of Assistant Land Commissioners.

MR. WALTER LONG: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether four of the five Assistant Land Commissioners, whose employment was recently discontinued, notwithstanding several years of approved service in each case, were subsequently reappointed for brief periods; and, if so, what were the circumstances which led to their reappointments.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Answer is in the affirmative. The gentlemen in question were, upon the recommendation of the Land Commission, reappointed for periods ranging from five to twelve weeks in order that the cases in which they had been engaged, but which has not been completed at the expiration of their term of office, might be disposed of without the necessity of incurring delay and expense in having the cases re-listed and re-heard.

Civil Examination for Assistant Land Commissioners.

MR. WALTER LONG: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in the opinion of the Irish Land Commissioners, the arrangement made with their approval some years ago for testing, by independent examination, at the hands of the Civil Service Commissioners, persons proposed to be appointed for the first time to the position of Assistant Commissioner, has worked satisfactorily; whether the views of the Land Commission were ascertained before it was recently determined to set aside this arrangement; and whether it has been decided to abrogate the arrangement in the cases of future similar appointments.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) Without expressing any disapproval of the arrangement by which some years ago, certain persons were examined by the Civil Service Commissioners for the position of Assistant Land Commissioner, the Irish Government considered that an examination is not necessary where there existed ample evidence, aliunde, not only of the fitness but of the special merits of certain of the candidates who offered themselves for these posts. It would be improper to state the nature of confidential communications which passed between the Land Commission and the Government. The Lord-Lieutenant has not arrived at any decision as to whether the method of examination by the Civil Service Commissioners will be used in the future or not.

MR. WALTER LONG: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what is the date of the Land Commission rule prescribing qualifications for the position of Assistant Land Commissioner; whether he will enumerate these qualifications; whether contemporaneously with the making of the rule the Irish Government arranged, with the full approval of the Land Commission, that all persons proposed thereafter to be appointed for the first time to the office of Assistant Commissioner should be required to undergo examination, conducted by the Civil Service Commissioners, in order to test their qualifications as set forth in the rule; and in what manner, without such independent examination, were these qualifications specifically tested in the case of the five new Assistant Commissioners who were recently appointed.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The date of the rule is March 13th, 1899, The qualifications are prescribed in the following provision of the rules:—The following persons shall be competent to be appointed for the first time to the office of Assistant Commissioner:—Practising barristers and solicitors of not less than six years' standing; Persons possessing the following qualifications:—(a) A practical acquaintance with the value of land in Ireland, and knowledge of the methods of land valuation; (b) Knowledge of the principles of land surveying and mapping, including skill in computing areas from maps and plans; (c) General educational fitness; and (d) Physical health, and capacity for outdoor work in connection with land valuation. There is nothing to show that the arrangement as to Civil Service examination was intended to apply generally to all persons proposed thereafter to be appointed. No arrangement of the kind, even if contemplated, could have been binding, because the appointments in question are made by the Lord-Lieutenant for the time being, who may adopt any method he thinks suitable for satisfying himself that the persons to be appointed possess the prescribed qualifications. As to the concluding inquiry, I beg to refer to my reply to the Question of the hon. Member for Mid Armagh on May 10th, 1906.†

Irish Evicted Tenants—Case of Jeremiah Murphy.

MR. SHEEHAN (Cork County, Mid.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have caused any inquiry to be made into the claim of Jeremiah Murphy, an evicted tenant on the estate of Bowen Colthurst, at Aharrin, Coachford, county Cork, for reinstatement; has the middleman, J. H. Weldon, Kilmallock, been approached in the matter, and, if so, with what result; and will he further state whether the negotiations for a sale of this estate have yet been concluded.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have had the holding in this case inspected, and having intimated to the middleman mentioned the price at which they would be prepared to purchase the holding if he should be in a position to sell it. Mr. Weldon has, however, refused to accept this price. The Commissioners are making further inquiries into the matter.

Belfast Harbour Commissioners.

MR. FIELD: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether there is any supervision over the Belfast Harbour Commissioners by any governmental department; whether he is aware that the ex-officio representation on that Board by the Belfast Corporation is not in force, the present Lord Mayor being an elected representative; whether there is any intention by the Government to reform the elective franchise of this Board, on which at present the plural votes amount to 6,000 in a total of 14,000, the highest qualified elector having 46 votes and the lowest rating qualification being £20; and whether he will consider the advisability of taking action in this matter.

† See (4) Debates, clvi., 1459.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Belfast Harbour Commissioners are not under the supervision of any department of the Government. The Lord Mayor of Belfast is ex-officio a member of the Harbour Board; but it is the fact that the present Lord Mayor is also an elected member of the Board. The electorate, consisting of shipowners and ratepayers, is constituted by The Belfast Harbour Act, 1883, the lowest rating qualification being £20. Plural votes are allowed by the Act, but I have no information as to the number of plural votes or as to the total number of electors. There are many other harbour boards in Ireland constituted on similar lines. So many suggestions for legislation on various subjects are made to the Irish Government that prudence dictates extreme caution before making any promises whatever.

Spread of Consumption in Ireland.

MR. FFRENCH (Wexford, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant whether he is aware that during the last thirty years the death rate from consumption in Ireland, per 10,000 of the population, has arisen from nineteen to twenty-two, whilst in England it has fallen from twenty-four to twelve; and whether to prevent the number of deaths from this disease in Ireland, about 13,000 annually, the Government contemplate providing, as in England, sanatoriums for the treatment of mild cases and isolation hospitals for incurables.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I beg to refer to the reply which I gave in the House to-day to a similar Question put by the hon. Member for West Cavan, when I stated the measures which are being taken to check the spread of consumption in Ireland. I think the hon. Member is under a misapprehension in thinking that the Government have provided in England institutions of the kind mentioned.

Irish Land Purchase—Application of Hugh Heavy of Tullyvilla, County Cavan.

MR. VINCENT KENNEDY (Cavan, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will say why Hugh Heavy, of Tullyvilla, Curlough, county Cavan, a tenant on the estate of David Finlay, deceased, in the Land Judge's Court, has had his purchase application refused by the Land Commission; will he say what is the area of this tenant's holding; and whether he will be offered an opportunity for purchasing the holding, which has been in his possession for the past fifteen years.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed by the Registrar of the Land Judge's Court that Hugh Heavy has already purchased the holding comprising 10¾ acres on the Finlay estate, of which he was tenant. Heavy was also sub-tenant of 2¾ acres of land, of which, in order to facilitate the sale of the estate, he was made direct tenant. He has, however, declined to purchase this portion unless there is included in it certain land upon which he is stated to have encroached. The suggestion that Heavy's purchase application has been refused by the Land Commission appears to be founded upon a misapprehension.

Status of Clerical Staff of the Irish Registry of Titles (Central Office).

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether steps will be taken, having regard to the interests of the public service, to ascertain and establish the status of the clerical staff of the Irish Registry of Titles Central Office, which is at present undetermined; and whether the Law Officers of the Crown have been consulted as to the best means of placing the members of this staff in a well-defined and established position.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I beg to refer to the Supreme Court of Judicature (Ireland) Bill, recently introduced by my right hon. and learned friend the Attorney-General for Ireland, which contains provisions regarding the status of both the present and future clerical staff of the office in question.

Scotch Volunteer Regiments attached to other than their own Brigade—Camp Allowance.

MAJOR ANSTRUTHER-GRAY (St. Andrew's Burghs): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been directed to the case of Scotch Volunteer regiments which, owing to the local holiday time not coinciding with the period of training of their own brigades, are attached to other brigades for camp training, and thereby forfeit camp allowance under Class I, thus losing 25 per cent.; and whether, in consideration of the fact that they perform the same work and receive the same training, he will consider the advisability of granting them allowance under Class I.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) My attention has been drawn to the matter. Under paragraph 535 of the Volunteer Regulations battalions cannot draw Class 1 allowances unless they attend the camp of their own brigade or a camp with the regular forces. It has, however, been decided that in the case of units allotted, under Army Order 130 of 1906, to brigades other than those to which they formerly belonged, Class 1 allowances will be granted if they camp with either their old or their new brigades, subject to the usual conditions that a brigade camp must consist of not less than three battalions.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Naval Promotions.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what were the average and minimum ages of the officers promoted from lieutenant to commander in the last batch of promotions; and on what calculation does he base the estimate that the rank of commander will be reached at about thirty-seven years of age under the new system of providing officers for the Navy.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON, Dundee): The average and minimum ages were thirty-two years four months and thirty years respectively. With regard to the last part of the Question—which, I understand, refers to a statement made by me in the course of the debate on Navy Vote 5—what I had intended to say was that the rank of commander would be reached at from thirty-two to thirty-seven. The rank of lieutenant will be reached at about twenty-two-and-a-half, and it is estimated that from ten to fourteen years or thereabouts will elapse before a lieutenant becomes commander.

Ceylon Civil Establishment.

SIR H. COTTON (Nottingham, E.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that the proposal for the provision of Rs.250,000 per annum to the Ceylon Civil Establishment, in order to provide enhanced salaries on a gold standard for officials ordinarily recruited in Europe, was carried in the Ceylon Legislative Council by the votes of the European members of the council, many of them being officials who would or might benefit under the vote, in face of the unanimous opposition of the Ceylonese unofficial members of the council; and whether, seeing that a representative public meeting, held at Colombo on February 3rd, 1906, unanimously protested against this vote and submitted a memorial to the Secretary of State praying for a consideration of this protest, and in view of the feeling on the subject in the Colony, His Majesty's Government are prepared to give favourable consideration to the subject of this memorial.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. CHURCHILL, Manchester, N.W.): With regard to the first Question, I would refer the hon. Member to the Secretary of State's despatch of January 25th, a copy of which, as published in Ceylon, has been placed in the Library. The memorial referred to has been received and considered, but the Secretary of State has not seen any cause to alter his view of the question, and the memorialists have been so informed.

*SIR H. COTTON further asked whether it was established by Lord Ripon in a despatch of October 9, 1894, and confirmed by the right hon. gentleman the Member for West Birmingham in a despatch of February 4, 1896, that all officers in the public service of Ceylon, whether domiciled or not, and of whatever nationality, were to be granted compensation for exchange at a common rate, and were placed on an equal footing; and whether these orders had not been set aside by the decision of the Legislative Council to which he had already referred.

MR. CHURCHILL: This matter was far advanced when the transfer of power from the late to the present Government took place. I understand that the object of the new regulations is to secure the salaries of officers who may be domiciled in this country being permanently payable on the sterling basis and without interfering at all with the salaries of officers not domiciled in the United Kingdom. Obviously, it is only those officers bona fide living in the United Kingdom who suffer by the fluctuation in exchange.

SIR H. COTTON: Is the hon Gentleman aware that there is grave dissatisfaction in the island?

MR. CHURCHILL: Yes, Sir, some dissatisfaction has been shown. But it is largely due, I think, to a misunderstanding; and, if the hon. Gentleman would read the despatch to which I have referred, I think he will see there was considerable justification for the late Government in embarking on this course, and for the present Government in not immediately reversing it.

British Guiana.

MR. BYLES (Salford, N.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies is he yet able to make any statement as to what action the Secretary for the Colonies has taken or intends to take in respect of the petition forwarded by the inhabitants of British Guiana, and a further petition from some members of the Court of Policy and Combined Court of British Guiana, containing grave allegations of misgovernment, and praying for the appointment of a committee of inquiry.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Secretary of State's replies to the petitions in question were despatched to the Governor of British Guiana on June 7th, and will be published in the Colony in due course. The correspondence will be presented to Parliament.

Foreign Commercial Agents in British Colonies.

MR. LAIDLAW (Renfrewshire, E.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return showing the number of commercial agents, other than consular agents, in the service of the respective Governments of Belgium, France, Germany, the United States of America, Japan, and Great Britain who are resident in the Colonies of Australia, and Canada and South Africa.

MR. CHURCHILL: I am afraid that considerable difficulty would be experienced in obtaining such a Return as the hon. Member desires; but if he can furnish me with more full information as to the object he has in view, I shall be in a better position to judge of the possibility of meeting his wishes.

Religious Processions in Malta.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if Protestant bodies in Malta are restricted from holding processions and other ceremonies in public, and, if so, will he explain why Roman Catholics are allowed this privilege.

MR. CHURCHILL: I am consulting the Governor of Malta upon the questions raised by the hon. Member's Question and as soon as I get his reply I will communicate with the hon. Member.

Appointments to the Indian Educational Service.

DR. HAZEL (West Bromwich): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether the following gentleman have lately been appointed to Bengal in the Imperial educational service, viz., Mr. E. Candler, a newspaper correspondent to the principalship of the Hooghly College, Mr. J. A. Chapman, recently a clerk in an exchange bank, to the principalship of the Calcutta Madrassah, and Mr. W. Horn, recently a private tutor in the family of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, to an inspectorship of schools; whether, seeing that high university distinction has ordinarily been considered an indispensable condition for holding such appointments, he can say what are the educational qualifications and university distinctions of each of the gentlemen named; and whether their appointments have superseded eminent Indian graduates of British universities, who are employed in the lower paid and subordinate ranks of the provincial educational service.

*THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. ELLIS, Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe): The gentlemen referred to have been appointed to hold charge of the posts mentioned temporarily, during the absence on leave of the permanent holders, and have not been appointed permanently to the Indian Educational Service. Mr. Candler was engaged in teaching in India from 1896 to 1903, and is stated to have shown exceptional fitness for work of that nature; Mr. Horne and Mr. Chapman have also been employed in educational work with good practical results. Mr. Horne took honours at Edinburgh; Mr. Candler is a graduate of Cambridge: as to Mr. Chapman's university career I have no information. The posts in question, which are among those allotted to the Indian Educational Service, would ordinarily be filled from this country, and are not open to the members of the Provincial Educational Service, who therefore, have not been superseded by the selection of the gentlemen above mentioned.

DR. HAZEL: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that Mr. Candler was Daily Mail correspondent in Thibet? Is that a sufficient qualification for the headship of a college?

*MR. ELLIS: I have no information as to the supposed connection with this newspaper and must ask for notice.

*SIR H. COTTON: Has it not been usual to appoint a man of oriental attainments to the principalship of the Calcutta Madrassah, and was it desirable to select a clerk in an exchange bank for the office?

*MR. ELLIS: My hon. friend seems to lose sight of the fact that these appointments are temporary.

Chicago Meat Packing Trade.

MR. H. H. MARKS (Kent, Thanet): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has now received a report from His Majesty's Consul in Chicago of his inspection of the meat-packing establishments in that city; and whether the Report will be published.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (SIR EDWARD GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): A report has been received and is being sent to the Local Government Board for their information. It was sent by the Consul for the information of His Majesty's Government, but I am doubtful as to the desirability of publishing any report except one written by an expert specially qualified to do so.

British Relations with Russia—Massacres of Jews in Russia.

SIR W. EVANS GORDON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in view of the fact that owing to the murder of the King of Servia diplomatic relations were broken off with that country, he proposes to adopt a similar course in consequence of the recent massacre of Jews in Russia.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The Answer is in the negative.

SIR W. EVANS GORDON: May I ask what distinction is drawn between the assassination of two crowned heads in Servia and the wholesale slaughter of these poor people in Russia?

SIR EDWARD GREY: I will reply to that Question in my Answer to the hon. Member for the Elland Division.

MR. TREVELYAN (Yorkshire, W.R., Elland): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on what date, approximately, during the summer months it is intended, under the present arrangements, that the British fleet should pay its ceremonial visit to a Russian port in the Baltic.

SIR EDWARD GREY: According to present arrangements, the fleet will in the course of its cruise in the Baltic call at Swedish, Russian, and German ports. It will call at four Russian ports. The exact dates have not yet been fixed, but they will be at the end of July and the beginning of August.

MR. TREVELYAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to appeals made in Russia to Great Britain not to send the British fleet on a ceremonial visit, on the ground that it would be interpreted in Russia as a demonstration hostile to the constitutional movement; whether he will make inquiries as to the prevalence or otherwise of this feeling among the constitutional party in Russia; and whether, meanwhile, His Majesty's Government will delay making final and unalterable arrangements for a visit of the fleet such as has been proposed.

SIR EDWARD GREY: I can add nothing to the Answers which I have already given. It seems to me quite out of the question that a visit of the fleet which was arranged some time ago should be regarded as having any reference whatever to internal affairs in Russia, or as having any influence upon them. Such visits during the summer cruise of the fleet have always been regarded hitherto as a simple act of courtesy to the country and people to whose neighbourhood the fleet has gone. But if it is desired that any fuller statement should be made, I would suggest that it should be postponed till the Foreign Office Vote, which is to be taken on July 5th.

Congo Free State.

MR. ALDEN (Middlesex, Tottenham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether in view of the fact that the evidence of the Commission of Inquiry affecting the Congo Free State has been suppressed by King Leopold and that the rights of the signatory Powers have been repeatedly traversed especially in regard to the question of trade monopolies, he can see his way to request the other Powers concerned to join with His Majesty's Government in making urgent representation of King Leopold for a redress of the grievances disclosed by the Commission.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RUNCIMAN, Dewsbury, for Sir EDWARD GREY): The Congo Government do not deny that they are bound by the stipulations of Article 5 of the Berlin Act. Before again approaching the Powers parties to that Act, it is necessary to see how the recently issued decrees are applied, and how far they are successful in providing a redress of the grievances disclosed by the Commission of Inquiry.

Brixton Prison.

MR. SEAVERNS (Lambeth, Brixton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that carpenters brought from Aylesbury are being employed by the contractors now building an addition to His Majesty's prison on Brixton Hill, and are being paid wages substantially lower than those paid to London carpenters; whether the contract provides that the wages current in London should be paid; and, if so, what action he proposes to take in the matter.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): I have made inquiry, and find that the contract in question, like other contracts made by the Prison Commissioners, requires that the wages shall not be less than the rates current for competent men in the district. The carpenters employed are actually being paid either the union rate or more. One apprentice and three improvers who came from Aylesbury are also employed; but I understand it is claimed that the trades union rates do not apply to improvers for twelve months after they have completed their apprenticeship. The Prison Commissioners report that the terms of the contract are being observed, and that no complaint has been made to them, and on the information at present before me I can see no reason for my taking any action.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): Why are the additions being made to this prison?

*MR. GLADSTONE: I suppose because they are needed.

MR. FLAVIN: We can lend you some Irish prisons.

Welsh Mine Inspection.

MR. LLEWELLYN WILLIAMS (Carmarthen District): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that Mr. Hugh Johnstone, who has been appointed chief inspector of mines for the Swansea district, has no knowledge of the Welsh language, and that the majority of the colliers in the Swansea district use Welsh as their ordinary speech; whether, before making the appointment, he had his attention directed to Section 39 (1) of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, which enacted that in such appointments in Wales and Monmouthshire preference should be given to persons having a knowledge of the Welsh language, and, if so, why that provision has been ignored in the present appointment; and whether, in view of the feeling entertained by all Welshmen, irrespective of party, on this matter, he can see his way to reconsider the appointment

*MR. GLADSTONE: My hon. friend is under a misapprehension in supposing that Mr. Johnstone has been appointed to take charge of the Swansea district. I have not filled the vacancy in that district by promoting an assistant inspector, but by transferring to Swansea Mr. W. N. Atkinson, one of the senior and most experienced of the existing inspectors, who is at present in charge of the Staffordshire district. In making the appointment I gave full consideration to the provision in the Act to which the hon. Member refers, which requires preference to be given to Welsh-speaking persons among candidates "otherwise equally qualified." In my judgment the South Wales coalfield is the most important of all, because of its particular liability to great disasters. In this matter, therefore, a very direct responsibility rests upon myself, and I felt it my duty to appoint an inspector whose standing and well-known experience specially qualify him for this post.

MR. LLEWELLYN WILLIAMS: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the three inspectors on the staff at present, Mr. Pearson of Scotland, Mr. Matthews of Liverpool, and Mr. Lewis, have passed their examinations, have been for several years on the staff, and are perfectly qualified to fill this post?

*MR. GLADSTONE: I quite follow my hon. friend, but I cannot add anything more to what I have said. In my judgment the best qualifications are standing experience and ability, and without disrespect to the gentlemen named, Mr. Attkinson's qualifications are considerably higher than those of anybody else. That being so, I felt it my duty to the district in question to appoint a man qualified by experience and ability for the duties of the post.

MR. LLEWELLYN WILLIAMS: Does Mr. Attkinson know Welsh?

*MR. GLADSTONE: He does not know Welsh, but I am advised that, although it is quite desirable that Welshmen should be appointed as far as possible, yet so far as the necessary duties are concerned a knowledge of Welsh is not essential.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Glamorganshire, Rhondda): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the gentleman he has appointed to this most dangerous district has, according to his own admission, no experience whatever of the Welsh system of mining, and no acquaintance whatever with any Welsh colliery at all?

*MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir. I am not aware of that; but after the most careful inquiry and consultation with mining engineers of practical experience of the subject I am quite satisfied that Mr. Atkinson is the best qualified man.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM: Seeing that the right hon. Gentleman is not aware of this important fact, will he kindly stay the appointment until he has ascertained whether this man knows anything about the Welsh system of mining?

*MR. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether South Wales coalfields are not particularly liable to explosions from coal dust; whether Mr. Atkinson has any particular knowledge of that subject, and whether in that respect he is well qualified to deal with mines of the character of the Welsh coal mines?

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, Sir.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM: May I ask this Gentleman, if he is allowed to give an opinion, to explain the difference in Welsh between——

*MR. SPEAKER: Order! order! The hon. Member is not entitled to ask a private Member a Question.

*MR. BRACE (Glamorganshire, S.): Arising out of this Question or discussion may I submit to the Home Secretary that this matter is so important to us—and we speak on behalf of 150,000 Welsh miners—that if he cannot agree to the reconsideration of it, we should have the opportunity of having the House adjourned later in the week, in order to debate the question fully.

MR. GLADSTONE: I would point out to my hon. friend that the debate on the Home Office Vote is bound to come on in the next two or three weeks, when there will be ample opportunity for a discussion of this very important question. For my part I make no complaint.

*MR. BRACE asked whether the Home Secretary would defer the confirmation of the appointment until after the Home Office Vote was taken, so that they might give their reasons to him for accepting their opinion on the matter as that of men who really did know something of the needs and requirements of the miners of South Wales.

COLONEL HERBERT (Monmouthshire, S.) also asked the right hon. Gentleman to ascertain whether the officials of the Home Office were aware of the difference between the coal mines of Wales and those in the North of England and Scotland.

MR. GLADSTONE said he had come to a decision after careful and close examination, and he could not delay the appointment.

*MR. BRACE: Then we will raise the question again.

Maghery (Moy) Post Office.

MR. MCKILLOP (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if he will state the reasons for the removal, in October last, of the post office, which has been situate at Maghery, Moy, county Armagh, for the past sixty years, to Derrylee, two miles distant, and in the same delivery and only two miles distant from Tamnamore; and whether, seeing that Maghery is an important navigation station and tourist resort on the shore of Lough Neagh, and Derrylee an inland hamlet of a few houses only, and in view of the public meetings held in the district protesting against the change, he will say what postal and telegraph facilities are at present provided for the residents of Maghery, and for the requirements of the local industries in its neighbourhood, and state what steps are being taken to establish a post office and telegraph station in Maghery.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I will look into the matter.

Sea Encroachments.

MR. STANLEY WILSON (Yorkshire, E.R., Holderness): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Government have yet received the report of Mr. Matthews, as to the effects of the recent encroachments by the sea in the south-east corner of the East Riding of Yorkshire; and whether the Government intend to take any steps to prevent the recurrence of such encroachments during the approaching autumn and winter.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE, Carnarvon Boroughs): The Board of Trade have received the joint report from Captain Frederick, one of their professional advisors and Mr. Matthews, C.M.G., as to the encroachment by the sea at and near Kilnsea. The report is receiving careful consideration, and I hope to be able to say shortly what conclusion has been arrived at.

MR. STANLEY WILSON: Can I see the report?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Certainly.

The Wreck of the "Courier."

SIR W. J. COLLINS (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has considered the Report of the local inquiry into the wreck of the "Courier" off Guernsey on April 30th last, whereby seven passengers, including five women and children, were drowned; and whether, in view of the evidence given, and of the differences in regard to regulations for merchant shipping obtaining in the Channel Islands from those observed in the British Isles, he will cause further investigation to be made into the circumstances connected with this disaster.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I have seen the Report of the inquiry held in Guernsey into the wreck of the "Courier." With regard to the differences between the the laws of the United Kingdom and the Channel Islands, I understand that communications are passing between my right hon. friend the Home Secretary and the Channel Islands authorities on the subject. The Board of Trade will be glad to co-operate in any measures that may be taken to bring the laws of the Channel Islands and the United Kingdom into harmony so far as it may be necessary to do so.

SIR W. J. COLLINS asked whether the Government would consider the propriety of introducing a new clause into the Merchant Shipping Bill making it applicable to the Channel Islands.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: We could hardly legislate for the Channel Islands. We do not legislate for the Colonies. We approach them, if necessary, to bring their legislation into line with our own.

Railway Working—Precaution against Accidents.

MR. WARDLE (Stockport): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been called to the practice of banking passenger and other trains up inclines on the London and North Western and Midland Railways, without either the engine in the rear being coupled to the train in front or any continuous brake connection being formed; and whether, in view of the possibility of accident to the front engine or train, and with a view to securing safe working, especially at night, he will say what steps he proposes to take, if any, to avoid such risk.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I am in communication with the railway companies referred to, and hope to be able to give my hon. friend a reply if he will put down his Question again in a few days.

Ill-Treatment of Ship's Apprentices.

MR. H. H. MARKS: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether complaint has been made to him that four lads who, by apprentice indentures, became apprentices to Messrs. Gibson and Clark, of Glasgow, and in July, 1905, joined the ship the "Pass of Killicrankie," were on the voyage from Antwerp to Los Angelos, treated with cruelty by the second officer, that proper medical attendance was not afforded, that sufficient and proper food was not supplied, that the captain neglected to properly supervise his under-officers, that the log book is defective, and that the master's reports are incorrect; and will he state what action he is taking in the matter.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Attention has been called to the case to which the hon. Member refers, and I am having inquiries made into the circumstances so that I may be in a position to decide what, if any, action should be taken by the Board of Trade in the matter.

MR. H. H. MARKS: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware complaint was made to the Consul at Los Angelos? Will he get his report?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: That is one of the inquiries we are instituting.

The Technological College.

SIR W. J. COLLINS: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether he can now state what action he proposes to take on the Report of the Departmental Committee on the Royal College of Science, &c.; and whether any reorganisation of the University of London is contemplated, with a view to the association with it of the proposed Technological College.

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. LOUGH, Islington, W., for Mr. BIRRELL): The Board are at present engaged in the preparation of a scheme for the establishment of a new institution on lines corresponding as closely as possible to those recommended by the Departmental Committee. The Board agree with that Committee in regarding it as of first importance that there should be no delay in the organisation of the institution, and with the recommendation of the Committee that its relation to the University of London should, in the first instance, be that of a "school of the University"—a recommendation in which the senate of the University have informed the Board that they concur. In considering the constitution of the new institution, the Board have had under consideration the suggestion of the Departmental Committee (No. 94, page 27) that without delaying the commencement of the new institution's work, a Royal Commission should be appointed to consider whether changes could advisedly be made in the character and constitution of the University which might make it desirable and possible to amalgamate the two institutions. They have also had before them the Resolution of the senate of the University deprecating the appointment of such a Royal Commission within so short a period after the reorganisation of the University, and expressing the desire that opportunity should be afforded for conference between the Board and the senate as to any changes of the kind suggested. In the course of the conference, which took place on March 9th, between the Board of Education and a deputation from the University senate upon these matters, the suggestions thrown out by the University deputation seemed to be contingent, practically, upon the incorporation of the new institution within the University. As this would necessitate a prolonged delay in the starting of the institution, which the Committee specially recommended should be avoided, the Board have found it impracticable to proceed on those lines, but are hastening as much as possible the preparation of a draft charter on the lines of the report of the Departmental Committee.

SIR W. J. COLLINS: Will an opportunity be afforded for further communications on the subject with the University of London?

MR. LOUGH: No doubt.

*SIR PHILIP MAGNUS (London University): Will the senate of the University of London have an opportunity of considering the scheme or draft charter before it is finally adopted by the Board of Education?

MR. LOUGH: I should like notice of that Question.

Registration of Teachers.

MR. SMEATON (Stirlingshire): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether, seeing that Clause 4 of the Board of Education Act, 1899, does not make preparation of the register of teachers obligatory, but only declares its preparation to be lawful, and that the teachers in Column B have paid fees for registration, he will consider the advisability of dropping Clause 36 of the Education Bill and cancelling the repeal of paragraph (a) of Clause 4 of the Board of Education Act, 1899, in the second schedule to the Bill, or, if such course be deemed inexpedient, of amending Clause 36 of the Bill by authorising the formation of a register of all teachers of approved training, irrespective of service in any particular type or class of school, with qualifications not less than those required for a university degree, competent to instruct children of school age.

MR. LOUGH: The points referred to in the Question will, I hope, receive full discussion in this House during the consideration of Clause 36 by the Committee. I do not think it wise to forestall that discussion by dealing with the matter beforehand by Answers to Questions such as that put to me by the hon. Member.

Miners' Association—Registration of Rules.

MR. RICHARDSON (Nottingham, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he is aware that in the year 1901 the Registrar of Friendly Societies registered the rules of the Derbyshire Miners' Association, containing as one of the objects of the association the promotion of legislation and labour representation, and that, on application being made by the Notts Miners' Association to register revised rules, he now requires the deletion of the same object from those rules; and will he explain why this distinction is being made.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. MCKENNA, Monmouthshire, N.): The chief registrar informs me that his action with regard to the Notts Miners' Association was based upon the interpretation, which he places upon the definition of a trade union as given in Section 16 of the Trade Union Act (1871) Amendment Act. The action referred to in 1901 was taken by the predecessor of the present chief registrar, presumably upon a different interpretation of his duties under the Act.

Pupil Teachers' Grants in Scotland.

MR. GULLAND (Dumfries Burghs): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he is aware that, in the new regulations for pupil teachers in England, an additional grant of £2 per head is given to county councils for the travelling and other incidental expenses of pupil teachers, making a total grant of £9 for each pupil teacher; and whether, in addition to the £8 per head allowed for the junior students in the minute for training of teachers in Scotland, he will endeavour to secure a similar grant for Scotland.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. SINCLAIR, Forfarshire): The cost to the Treasury, under the new regulations for England, of a pupil teacher who completes a three years course is £6+£9+£9=£24—exactly the cost of a junior student who completes his course under the regulations for Scotland. But a large proportion of the pupil teachers in England take only a two years course, in which case their cost to the Treasury is only £9+£9=£18—less than in Scotland.

South Leith Manse Assessment.

*MR. McCRAE (Edinburgh, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he is aware of the dissatisfaction existing in Edinburgh and Leith against the proposal to levy an ecclesiastical assessment for repairs on the manse of South Leith parish church; whether he is aware that these repairs cost £589, to which is to be added the cost of collection, amounting to an additional £400, and that an assessment of five-eighths of a penny per pound is to be levied, which will produce £1,250; whether he is aware that meetings have been held pledging the heritors to resist the imposition of the assessment; and if he will consider the advisability of introducing legislation to prevent the levying of such assessments.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith): I beg also to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether, in view of the facts disclosed in the South Leith manse assessment case, he will propose legislation to abate such impositions in Scotland.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON (Lanarkshire, N.W.) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was also aware that at a kirk session an intimation was given that relief would be given to heritors under £50 and that those over £50 would be relieved to the extent of the assessment.

MR. SINCLAIR: Opinion among the heritors appears to be divided, and I am informed that the cost of collection did not amount to £400. With these exceptions, my hon. friend's statement of the facts, so far as it goes, seems to be correct. In reply to his last Question and that of my hon. friend the Member for Leith I may remind them that in 1900 the late Government passed an Ecclesiastical Assessments (Scotland) Act. The procedure laid down by that Act is apparently being followed by the heritors in this instance, and will be closely watched by the Government with the view of considering the advisability of introducing further legislation.

*MR. McCRAE: Is my right hon. friend aware that yesterday at a meeting of the heritors, amid disorder, a motion was said to be carried to impose the assessment? And will he give facilities for a Private Member's Bill dealing with the matter?

MR. SINCLAIR: I know nothing about the meeting, and cannot give any undertaking as to a measure till I have seen it.

Sound of Kilbrennan—Herring Fishing.

*MR. LAMONT (Buteshire): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he is aware that, in the Sound of Kilbrennan, herring fishing is being systematically prosecuted during daylight hours, in contravention of the Act 52 and 53 Vic., c. 23, s. 5; and whether, in view of the injury thereby done to those fishermen who abide by the law, he will now direct the Scottish Fishery Board to perform their duty in securing the enforcement of the statute.

MR. SINCLAIR: I am not aware that there has been systematic contravention of the Act 52 and 53 Vic., c. 23, s. 6, but on Friday last the Fishery Board for Scotland received a complaint on the subject, and telegraphed to the commander of the fishery cruiser "Vigilant" instructing him to proceed to the Sound to inquire and report on the matter. If the complaints prove to be well founded, steps will be taken to enforce the law.

Cork Magistracy.

Mr. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney-General for Ireland whether he is aware that, of the nine magistrates appointed in the county of Cork from May, 1905, to March, 1906, eight are Protestant Gentlemen and only one Catholic; and whether, in view of this disparity, representations will be made to the Lord Chancellor to appoint some of the gentlemen who have recently been recommended by district councils and other popularly elected bodies.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. Cherry, Liverpool, Exchange): I am not aware, except from what the hon. Member tells me, of the religious beliefs of the gentlemen appointed to the Commission of the Peace in the county of Cork during the period mentioned in the Question. The appointments referred to, I am informed, were all made before the present Government came into office. Any representations which I may receive from district councils or other elected bodies recommending the appointment of gentlemen to the Commission of the Peace, I shall with pleasure submit to the Lord Chancellor, and I am sure that he will give them his most favourable consideration.

Cooscroum (Kerry) Pier.

Mr. BOLAND (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the fact that the necessity for building a slip or pier at Cooscroum, county Kerry, was brought to his personal knowledge when in that district, and that the local district council has passed a Resolution in favour of the scheme, that there are no facilities for landing afforded to the thirty fishing boats which use the cove, and that, owing to the presence of massive boulders, it is impossible in stormy weather for more than one boat at a time to be hauled up, he will urge upon the Congested Districts Board the necessity of providing landing facilities, or else avail himself of the powers under the Marine Works Act, in conjunction with the Congested Districts Board, to construct a pier.

Mr. CHERRY (for Mr. Bryce): On the occasion of my recent visit to the locality, I received a memorial from the fishermen of Cooscroum asking for the construction of a landing place there, and was impressed by the facts therein brought before me. The memorial will be considered by the Congested Districts Board at the next meeting.

Irish Fisheries—Boat Building Return.

Sir THOMAS ESMONDE (Wexford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state when the Return as to the building of boats for the various Government Departments connected with Irish fisheries, ordered by this House earlier in the present session, will be laid.

Mr. CHERRY: The Return is, I understand, approaching completion, and will be laid on the Table in the course of a few days.

Marine Works Act.

Sir THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will give a Return, showing the result of the inquiries made by the Board of Public Works in Ireland, in connection with the investigations conducted by the late Government with a view to the extension of the operations of the Marine Works Act to districts outside the congested districts, and referred to in this House by the late Chief Secretary in March, 1905, and by his predecessor in July, 1904, and March, 1904.

Mr. CHERRY: I am informed that there is no record of any investigation having been conducted by the late Irish Government with the view indicated in the Question, and that the Board of Works have made no inquiries in the matter. I cannot find that either of my predecessors in office referred to the subject in this House at the dates mentioned, but if the hon. Baronet will give me a more precise reference I will have the matter further looked into.

Artisans' Dwellings in Irish Urban Districts.

Mr. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, pending legislation for the granting of facilities for the erection of artisans' dwellings in urban districts in Ireland, steps will be taken by a departmental arrangement to enable urban authorities to borrow on easier and cheaper terms money required for the better housing of labourers in the towns.

MR. CHERRY: I am afraid that what the hon. Member asks is not possible without legislation. If reference be made to Section 1 of the Public Works Loans Act, 1897, it will be seen that loans to local bodies can only be made at rates which will not involve loss to the local loans fund, and I am informed that the rates now charged are only such as are necessary to keep that fund self-supporting. I would refer the hon. Member to my reply to the Question of the hon. Member for West Kerry on Thursday last.†

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.): Is not money raised at 3 per cent. and lent to the local authorities at 4¼ per cent.?

MR. CHERRY: That Question should be addressed to the Secretary to the Treasury.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Will the right hon. Gentleman bear in mind that there is a strong feeling in Ireland that working men living in towns should be afforded equal facilities with those in the country for buying cottages? Will he bring in a legislation to secure that?

MR. CHERRY: In view of the state of business I do not think legislation would be possible this year.

MR. FLAVIN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in urban areas the wage of the artisan is little more than that of the agricultural labourer?

MR. CHERRY: Yes, and I certainly think the labourers in urban districts deserve consideration.

Irish Land Purchase—Average Prices.

MR. P. A. MCHUGH (Sligo, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the average price in terms of years' purchase paid by the Congested Districts Board for lands purchased by them in each of the years ended on March 31st, 1901, 1902, 1903, 1904, 1905, and 1906.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): The Answer to this Question contains a tabular statement of figures which could not be made very intelligible in an oral reply, and with the hon. Member's permission I will circulate the Answer with the Votes.‡

Price of Congested Estates.

MR. P. A. MCHUGH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state, in terms of years' purchase, the average price paid by the Estates Commissioners for congested estates purchased by them in each of the years ended March 31st, 1904, 1905, and 1906 respectively.

MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have not yet completed the purchase of any congested estate. They have agreed during the year ended March 31st, 1906, to purchase one congested estate and the price to be paid for tenanted portion of this estate is 22·2 years purchase.

Clare Evicted Tenants.

MR. HALPIN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state the number of evicted tenants in West Clare and in East Clare respectively who have applied to the Estates Commissioners to have them reinstated in their holdings; and whether he is aware of the number of evicted tenants in both divisions who have not yet applied to be reinstated, but who are just doing so.

MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners have received applications from 217 persons seeking reinstatement as evicted tenants in the entire county of Clare. The Commissioners' records are not kept by Parliamentary divisions. They have no information as to the number of evicted tenants who have not yet applied, but are about to do so.

Evicted Farms in County Clare.

MR. HALPIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will make inquiries from the Estates Commissioners why their inspector, who went to West Clare and to East Clare to inspect evicted tenants' holdings, has not yet inspected several of these holdings; whether he will give instructions to the Estates Commissioners to have their inspectors visit every evicted farm in Clare as soon as possible; and whether, in view of the fact that some of those people have had to go into the towns and villages to earn what will support their families, he will request the Estates Commissioners to apply to honorary secretaries of the local branches of the United Irish League to give them information in reference to the evictions, especially of those who have not yet applied to them for reinstatement.

---

‡ See Col. 754.

*MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that their inspector in Clare is inquiring into the applications of evicted tenants in that county as rapidly as possible. Over 200 applications have been received, and inquiries into all these cases must obviously take time. The Commissioners tell me that they will duly consider any useful information regarding evicted tenants which may reach them from any source. I infer that they do not propose to make inquiries into the cases of evicted tenants from whom no application is received.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the settlement of this question is really bound up with the public peace in Ireland?

*MR. BRYCE: Yes, and I am sure the Estates Commissioners fully appreciate the importance of dealing with these cases as soon as possible.

South Cork Fisheries.

MR. EDWARD BARRY (Cork County, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has satisfied himself that the fisheries in Unionhall and other centres in South Cork, as well as mineral resources of Benduff and other quarries in the neighbourhood of Rosscarbery, cannot be effectually developed without the construction of a local railway for the more rapid transit of fish, slate, and other products; and, if so, will steps be taken to carry this project into effect.

*MR. BRYCE: I beg to refer to the reply given on my behalf by my right hon. friend the Attorney-General for Ireland to the hon. Member's previous question on May 17th.† It was then stated that the subject of railway extension to the district in question will be duly considered should there be a prospect of obtaining funds for the purpose. I have since then visited the district and should be glad to see its resources further developed, but so many plans for developing different parts of Ireland have come before me, all involving large expenditure, that I cannot venture at present to give an undertaking regarding the particular extension desired by the hon. Member.

Muckross Barytes Mines.

MR. EDWARD BARRY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether seeing that the working of the barytes mines at Muckross, Ardfield, Clonakilty, has been suspended some time, thereby throwing a number of skilled workmen in that district out of employment, and seeing that those mines yield the best mineral of that species in the South of Ireland, and in view of the number of miners in that district awaiting the resumption of work at these mines, steps will be taken to induce the Department of Agriculture to send down an inspector to report on their condition and capabilities.

*MR. BRYCE: The Department of Agriculture intend to have the locality in question visited by their expert, but owing to the pressure of prior engagements it will not be practicable for him to make inspections in that locality for some time to come.

Loans for Labourers' Cottages.

MR. SHEEHAN (Cork County, Mid.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will consider the desirability of representing to the Treasury the great convenience which would result to several rural district councils in Ireland, and to hundreds of labourers whose applications for cottages have passed all the Local Government Board inquiries, if arrangements could be made in the Labourers Bill whereby loans could be issued at the reduced rate of interest immediately on the Royal Assent being given to it in all cases in which schemes are at present perfected.

† See (4) Debates, clvii., 659.

*MR. BRYCE: I will convey to the Treasury the suggestion made by the hon. Member, but he will realise that the adoption of any earlier date than that mentioned in the Bill might involve administrative difficulty.

Constable Masterson, Royal Irish Constabulary.

MR. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any information is forthcoming of the whereabouts of Constable Masterson, Royal Irish Constabulary, late of Mountmellick, who was returned for trial to the Queen's County assizes for an assault committed on Edward Carroll, Rosenallis, on March 17th, 1905; and whether he can say why Masterson was permitted to abscond pending trial, and the payment of damages obtained against him in a civil action arising out of the same case.

I beg also to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a verdict for £100 damages and costs was obtained by a labourer, named Edward Carroll, Lacken, Rosenallis, Queen's County, against Constables Masterson and Cryan, Royal Irish Constabulary, late of Mountmellick, for an assault committed on March 17th, 1905; can he say if the damages have been paid; and, if not, will he see, considering Carroll's health has been permanently injured, that Constable Cryan, who is still in the force, does not evade his responsibilities in the matter.

MR. BRYCE: The Inspector-General informs me that no information is forthcoming as to the whereabouts of ex-constable Masterson. The matters referred to occurred before the present Government came into office, and I find that my predecessor made a full statement upon the matters in reply to Questions put by the hon. Member. As regards the case of Constable Cryan, I am informed that no change has taken place since I answered the hon. Member's previous Question on March 1st last.† The plaintiff does not appear to have accepted the constable's offer to pay his share of the damages by instalments. The question of proceeding for the recovery of the damages is one for the plaintiff.

Cappamore Evicted Tenants.

MR. LUNDON (Limerick, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that William O'Brien, of Curraghlahan, Cappamore, county Limerick, has been since August, 1899, evicted from his holding; and will he take steps, through the Estates Commissioners, to reinstate O'Brien in his farm or in a farm of equivalent value elsewhere.

MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners have received from William O'Brien an application for reinstatement as an evicted tenant. The Commissioners will have the case enquired into, but until their inspector's report has been received they are unable to state what action they may take in the matter.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY (Limerick, W.): Has the inspector gone down to this place yet?

MR. BRYCE: I am not aware, but I do know the Commission are doing all they can to dispose of these cases.

Lloyd Estate, Cappamore.

MR. LUNDON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on the Lloyd estate, Portnard, Cappamore, county Limerick, negotiations for sale and purchase, as between landlord and tenants, were opened about six years ago, before the Judge of the Land Court, under the fortieth section of the Land Act of 1896, but were adjourned until the rental could be arranged; that about a year later the mortgagees on the property offered to sell at nineteen years purchase, the tenants offering eighteen years; and will he take steps, through the Estates Commissioners, to open negotiations again for the sale.

MR. BRYCE: I am informed by the Land Commission that the only estate in the district referred to in regard to which a request under the section quoted was lodged with the Commissioners was the estate of William Thomas Lloyd. The holdings on this estate were with one exception sold to the tenants in the year

† See (4) Debates, clii., 1270.

1901. If the hon. Member refers to the estate of R. E. Lloyd, no proceedings have, I am informed, ever taken place under Section 40 in regard to it.

Irish Intermediate Education Commission.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Intermediate Education Commissioners changed their programme last year, two months after the school year began, by replacing botany as a special subject counting for an exhibition, after they had deposed it and hygiene, amongst other subjects, in the rules issued in 1906; and whether, seeing that the Board did make these alterations in their programme in the month of October, when the House was not sitting, he will explain why they refuse now to make alterations involving no greater difficulty.

MR. BRYCE: I am informed by the Commissioners of Intermediate Education that the facts are as stated in the Question. The alteration made in the month of October, 1905, in the rules for 1906 affected a very small number of candidates and did not in any way influence the conditions of passing the examination generally. The alterations now in question would concern a very large number of candidates and the character of the pass examination would be modified.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL: Is it not a fact that the alterations which this House adopted were not at all as difficult as the alterations adopted by the Board without the consent of the House?

MR. BRYCE: That is not the case according to the information given me by the Board.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL: Is it not a fact that members of the Board have stated that it is misleading to say that there is any difficulty whatever in adopting the suggestions of the House?

MR. BRYCE: I do not know.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL: Can we get a day to discuss this matter, because it is a very serious one.

MR. BRYCE: The business of the House is not under my control, as the hon. Member knows.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): Is the right hon. Gentleman now in a position to give an Answer to the Question I addressed to him the other day—is it true that after this House unanimously passed a Resolution altering these rules the Board of Intermediate Education passed a Resolution refusing to alter them?

MR. BRYCE: I do not think that arises out of the Question, but at any rate I am not in a position to announce the terms of the correspondence.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S): Is it a fact that this House has no control over the Commissioners?

MR. BRYCE: Hon. Members can look at the statute under which the Board was established and they will see what the legal position is.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: Has not the Board control in this respect, that if the Board disregard the action of this House the right hon. Gentleman or the Government can dismiss the Board?

MR. BRYCE: I am not aware that that is so.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): Is not the Board by its very constitution bound by a Resolution of this House?

MR. BRYCE: I venture to think, Mr. Speaker, that these questions do not arise out of the Question on the Paper.

Protection of Irish Fisheries.

MR. POWER (Waterford, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, seeing that the Admiralty place at the disposal of the Scotch fishery authorities gunboats, to assist the gunboats provided by the Fishery Board for prohibiting illegal fishing, and in view of the injury done to the Irish fisheries by steam trawlers, and the extent of coast to be patrolled, he will make application to the Admiralty to supply gunboats to assist those at present employed by the Irish fishery authorities for the protection of the Irish Fisheries.

MR. BRYCE: The question of the assistance to be rendered by the Admiralty in the protection of Irish Fisheries has from time to time been the subject of correspondence between the Irish Government and the Admiralty, from which it would appear that the function of the Admiralty is confined to the protection of Irish territorial waters from foreign vessels. Admiralty cruisers are employed for this purpose in Irish waters as occasion requires, and I understand that a conviction was recently obtained in Ireland against a foreign vessel captured by an Admiralty cruiser. The areas around the Irish coast in which steam trawling is prohibited are effectively patrolled by the Department of Agriculture's steam cruiser "Helga," with the occasional assistance of the steamship "Granuaille," which belongs to the Congested Districts Board.

MR. POWER: But the Admiralty do afford assistance to Scottish fisheries.

MR. BRYCE: Yes, but only for one purpose. There is a difference between the law of Scotland and of Ireland, but it does not affect the general duty of the Admiralty as regards trawlers.

MR. JOYCE (Limerick): And only yesterday a Minister of the Crown promised protection to the Cornish crabbers.

*MR. SPEAKER: That does not arise out of the Question on the Paper.

Kilcloney Evicted Farm.

MR. HAMMOND (Carlow): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland is he aware that the caretaker, O'Neill, is still in possession of the evicted farm known as Kilcloney, near Borris, in Carlow County, and that within the past two weeks he cut down and had carted away some trees planted on the holding by the Waters' family, which he had no right to do; will he say if the Estates Commissioners have purchased this Kilcloney farm; and, if so, on what date, and will Mr. Waters be reinstated.

MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners understand that O'Neill is still in occupation of the farm in question, but they inform me that they have decided not to sell the farm to him. The offer which the Commissioners are about to make for the purchase of the estate, provides for the sale to them of this farm as untenanted land. Patrick Waters has signed an undertaking to purchase it from the Commissioners in the event of their acquiring the estate, and he will be reinstated if their offer should be accepted. The Commissioners have no information as to the alleged cutting of trees by O'Neill.

Dunmore Fishery.

MR. POWER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state how many local fishermen are now employed in beam trawling and line and trammel fishing at Dunmore East, county Waterford; is he aware that more than twenty beam trawlers were employed at Dunmore before steam trawling was introduced, and that the supply of trawl fish has decreased, and the price of the same increased since the introduction of steam trawling.

MR. BRYCE: The Department of Agriculture are aware that there is one local boat using a beam trawl at Dunmore East, and a few small boats that occasionally fish with lines. About ten years ago, before the steam trawling began, a number of English and Irish herring boats frequented Dunmore East for the purpose of trawling. At an inquiry recently held at Dunmore East, evidence was given that the price for trawl fish in Waterford was higher since the advent of steam trawling. I have no information as to whether the supply of trawl fish has decreased.

Inspection of Bilingual Schools.

MR. BOLAND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland can he state whether any, and, if so, what steps have been taken to secure that the inspection of bilingual schools shall be competently conducted; whether he is aware that the teachers of a bilingual school at Partry, Ballinrobe, have been condemned on the report of an inspector who is not qualified to inspect a bilingual school; and whether it is proposed to act on this report.

MR. BRYCE: The Commissioners of National Education inform me that schools in which the bilingual programme has been sanctioned are inspected by inspectors who have a competent knowledge of Irish, and the annual inspections are in all cases conducted by these officers. Incidental visits to such schools are also paid by the inspector of the district, and in the case referred to the district inspector has reported serious defects in the teaching. As a result, the Commissioners have informed the manager that unless a marked improvement in the proficiency of the pupils should take place, the retention of the bilingual programme in the school will be re-considered. The action which the Commissioners may take in the matter will depend upon the character of the next Report to be furnished by one of the inspectors specially in charge of the bilingual schools.

MR. BOLAND: Did not the inspector state in this case that too much attention was given to Irish; what can be his definition of a bilingual school?

MR. BRYCE: I am not aware of that statement. There is nothing so dangerous as to give definitions.

Fees for Irish Instruction.

MR. BOLAND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland can he state the number of schools in which, according to the latest Returns, fees for Irish were paid during the last year; the number of pupils paid for instruction in Irish in these schools during the past year, the number of pupils in standards higher than first, in average attendance at these schools during the past year; the amount of special fees for Irish paid in these schools during the past year; the amount of fees which would have been paid in these schools if payment under the proposed new regulations was made for every pupil in the school in average attendance in standards higher than the first.

MR. BRYCE: I am informed by the Commissioners of National Education that the number of schools in which fees were paid for Irish during the past year was 1,234, and the number of pupils in respect of whose instruction in Irish fees were paid was 25,265. No Returns are, I am informed, available from which it can be ascertained how many pupils, in standards higher than the first, were in average attendance during the past year. The amount of special fees for Irish paid in these schools last year was £11,6 3. The Commissioners cannot estimate the amount of fees which would have been paid in the circumstances mentioned in the last paragraph.

Prevention of Consumption in Ireland.

MR. VINCENT KENNEDY (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a pamphlet from the Ulster branch of the National Association for the Prevention of Consumption in Ireland, setting out that in the last thirty years the death rate from consumption per 10,000 of the population has fallen in England from twenty-four to twelve, while in Ireland the death-rate from this preventible disease has risen from nineteen to twenty-two per 10,000 of the population, and that annually nearly 13,000 people die in Ireland from this disease; will he say if this sacrifice of life is having the attention of the Government; and will the whole matter be immediately dealt with by legislation or otherwise.

MR. BRYCE: I have received the pamphlet referred to. The figures are substantially, though not precisely, as stated. The fall in England during the last thirty years was from twenty-one (not twenty-four) to twelve per 10,000. The rise in Ireland was from eighteen (not nineteen) to twenty-two. The Local Government Board are about to issue circulars to local authorities and medical officers of health containing recommendations and instructions as to the means to be adopted to check the spread of consumption. The subject has been receiving, and will continue to receive, the careful consideration of the Government.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Has the attention of the right hon. Gentleman been directed to an order issued by the Scottish Local Government Board on this subject?

MR. BRYCE: Yes.

Fair Rent Appeals.

MR. VINCENT KENNEDY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state how many fair rent appeals are pending before the Land Commission; how many of these appeals are from the Sub-Commission and the county court respectively; how many of these appeals have been lodged by the tenant to June 1st, 1906; and how many by the landlord, excluding cases of cross appeal.

MR. BRYCE: The Land Commission inform me that on June 1st, 1906, the number of fair rent appeals pending before them was 9,264, of which 8,503 were cases from sub-commissions, and 761 from county courts. It would not, I am informed, be possible to state how many of these appeals were lodged by the tenant and landlord, respectively, without an examination of the notice of appeal in each of the 9,264 cases, and this would take a very considerable time.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Can the right hon. Gentleman hold out any hope that the hearing of these appeals will be expedited?

MR. BRYCE: I will do my best, but the matter is not under my control.

MR. FLAVIN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that some of these appeals were entered four or five years ago, and are not yet listed for hearing?

MR. BRYCE: I have no information as to that.

MR. FLAVIN: I have personal knowledge of it.

Congested Districts Board Clerks—Examination Papers.

MR. VINCENT KENNEDY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether officials of the Congested Districts Board for Ireland mark the papers set at the examinations for temporary clerks in their offices; and, if so, will he consider the advisability of employing capable outsiders independent of the Board for the purpose, in view of complaints among candidates as to the marking of their papers by possibly influenced or prejudiced officials.

MR. BRYCE: The examination papers of candidates for temporary clerkships in the office of the Congested Districts Board are marked by the secretary, assistant secretary, and chief clerk, who have before them the candidates' examination numbers only. The employment of outside examiners would be a considerable charge on the Board's funds, and is not considered necessary. No complaint as to the marking of examination papers has ever been made to the Board, but it is perhaps hardly to be expected that all unsuccessful candidates should be satisfied with the results.

Irish Bankruptcy Law.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG (Antrim, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Committee which has been appointed to inquire into the Bankruptcy Laws has received instructions to investigate the state of the Law in Ireland; and, if not, whether, having regard to the desire in Ireland to have the Law altered so as to conform with the English Bankruptcy Law, he will arrange that the question of Irish Bankruptcy Law shall be inquired into.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: The terms of reference to the Committee appointed by the Board of Trade are wide enough to include Ireland; but the Committee has no representative of Irish opinion upon it. It is a purely Departmental Committee, and as the powers of the Board of Trade in relation to Bankruptcy matters do not extend to Ireland they would not be justified in investigating the question of the Irish Bankruptcy Laws except with the assent of the Irish Office. I shall be happy to furnish the hon. Member with a copy of the statement of the Chairman of the Committee as to the course which it is intended to pursue on that point.

Irish Finance.

MR. THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he can state the amount of interest to the end of June, 1906, realised by the arrangements made last year for the utilising of the current balances of certain Irish public funds by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer; and if he will continue the inquiry initiated by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer for the purpose of ascertaining whether further funds credited to Irish public departments, or held by the Treasury for Irish purposes, can be similarly utilised with a view to increasing the sums now available for the purposes of Irish development; and whether he will arrange to have a separate account of the sums realised under the existing arrangements and under any further arrangements shown annually in connection with Irish Estimates or in a Parliamentary Return.

MR. McKENNA: As shown in the Annual Report under the Ireland Development Grant Act (Command Paper No. 2937) the amount received by the Development Grant Fund during 1905–6 for interest on monies placed on deposit at the Bank was £751 11s. 8d. The amount received as interest by the Department of Agriculture and the Congested Districts Board are shown in statements appended to the annual Appropriation Accounts, and similar receipts are shown in the accounts rendered to Parliament in respect of other funds. I understand that the result of inquiries made last year was to show that the available balances in the hands of Irish Departments were duly turned to account. I have no reason to doubt that such is still the case.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE suggested that a general statement might be got out showing the amount derived annually.

MR. McKENNA: These figures are already given fully. I do not think it would be worth while to make a special return.

The Unemployed.

MR. HAROLD COX (Preston): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether in any proposals that His Majesty's Government may make for dealing with the problem of the unemployed they will take care that men and women now in employment are not thrown out of employment by the diminution, through taxation, of funds now spent by private persons in giving employment to the wage-earning classes.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling Burghs): My hon. friend's Question is rather in the nature of a friendly admonition than an ordinary interrogation; but I may tell him that we are quite alive to the importance of the point to which he directs our attention.

MONASTIC AND CONVENTUAL INSTITUTIONS BILL.

MR. T. L. CORBETT (Down, N.) moved for leave to introduce a Bill to appoint Commissioners to inquire as to the growth in numbers of conventual and monastic institutions in Great Britain and Ireland; and whether any further regulations of such institutions are required. He said that these institutions had increased in England and Wales from fifty-two in 1850 to 1,057 in 1905, while in Ireland there were 592 such places, and sixty-two in Scotland. At present there was no regulation and no inspection of these institutions. They were a law unto themselves. England was, he believed, the only country in which such a condition of things existed. The result of the action of foreign Governments had been an immense influx of expelled orders into this country during the last twelve or eighteen months, and if His Majesty's Government would but grant the inquiry the Bill proposed, the figures would be found startling. He believed he was not overstating the case when he said that there were tens of thousands of men and women within the walls of these institutions who had no appeal to, and no protection from, the common law of the State. [AN HON. MEMBER: "Bosh!"] He was not sure that "Bosh!" was a Parliamentary expression, but if the hon. Member who used it doubted the truth of the statement just made, let him agree to an inquiry. The granting of unchecked and unbridled power to the heads of these institutions meant, at all events, the possibility of tyranny and cruelty.

*THE SPEAKER reminded the hon. Member that he had exceeded the limit of time usually accorded to Motions of this character.

MR. T. L. CORBETT: Then, Sir, I will only formally move.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill, to appoint Commissioners to inquire as to the growth in numbers of Conventual and Monastic Institutions in Great Britain and Ireland; and whether any further regulations of such Institutions are required."—(Mr. T. L. Corbett.)

MR. T. P. CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland) submitted that the conduct of the hon. Member was an abuse of the rules of the House.

MR. T. L. CORBETT asked whether the hon. Member was in order in charging him with having abused the rules of the House.

*MR. SPEAKER said the frequent repetition of the use of this form would have a tendency to become an abuse, but, so long as the rule was only put into force occasionally, he could not say it was an abuse of the forms of the House. There had not been an instance of this kind for some little time, and therefore he could not consider that the action of the hon. Member was an abuse. But if it were frequently put into practice, he should have to say that the hon. Member for the Scotland Division was right in the terms he had used.

MR. T. L. CORBETT: Does the hon. Member withdraw the expression?

*MR. SPEAKER: There is nothing to withdraw.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): Except the Bill.

MR. O'CONNOR said the Nationalists had listened to a speech which was in some respects an attack on that which they held most dear. Two sets of figures sufficiently indicated to the House the reason of this proposal. This was the 26th June, and it had been announced by the Government that the Session would come to an end about the 4th August. The hon. Gentleman must therefore be perfectly aware that there was not the smallest chance of his Bill becoming law this session. Therefore the hon. Gentleman did not bring in his Bill with any hope of its passing into law. He would tell the House why the hon. Gentleman brought in this Bill. It was now exactly seventeen days from the 12th July. For the benefit of English Members he might say that on the 12th July, 1690, there was fought the Battle of the Boyne. The liberties that were then supposed to be assailed had already been gained, and the hatred that was then established had been removed; therefore there was no reason why any tolerant or fair-minded man should seek by such commemorations as the hon. Gentleman would take part in to revive the sad and unhappy memories of dead conflicts and what ought to be dead religious controversies. The hon. Gentleman had brought in this Bill in preparation for the 12th July. In Ireland there was going on a movement which every honest man, Protestant or Catholic, ought to help, and which every decent Catholic and Protestant in Ireland did help, namely, the closing of the era of religious conflict, religious hatred, and religious passion, through which seas of human blood had been shed in Ireland, and the dawn of a placid epoch. There was, however, still left a gang in Ireland, some of them Irish and some of them not, some of them sincere with the fanaticism of bigotry, some of them sincere with the exploitation of politics, who were determined to bring these embers into flame again, and once more to divide Catholic and Protestant. The hon. Gentleman was one of that gang. He much mistook the temper of this House if it did not ignominiously reject this ignoble attempt to revive the embers of dying bigotry.

EDUCATION (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL.

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. EMMOTT (Oldham) in the Chair.]

Clause 4 :—

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 39, to leave out the word 'may' and insert the word 'shall.'"—(Mr. Evelyn Cecil.)

Question again proposed, "That the word 'may' stand part of the Clause."

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N.) said that the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, in the course of his speech before the adjournment on the previous day, had commented upon what he considered the slender degree of support that the Government Amendments had received. The right hon. Gentleman a little under-rated and under-estimated the value of the support that they did receive and ignored the amount they could have received had their supporters thought fit to prolong the discussion by expressing one after the other their general agreement. He was, however, perfectly willing to acknowledge that the Parliamentary history of Clause 4, whether in its original form or as amended, and also its history in the country, afforded slender encouragement to a Minister to labour to secure concessions and to establish exceptions from the general principle of a Bill which received the united and enthusiastic support of a great Parliamentary majority, in that respect at all events compact, eager, and united. Everybody had been telling him almost every day during the last three months:—"Why do you not stick to Clause 1—plain, intelligible, in accordance with the views of the country on your side, what the country expects?" "What," they said, "do you expect to get from those for whose benefit this clause is designed? You are quenching, to some extent, our enthusiasm; you will get nothing but cold words; indeed, you will be luckly if you escape a certain amount of abuse from the people whose interests you have laboured to the best of your ability to serve." That had been said to him again and again, and he always recognised its entire truth, and it was not necessary for him to wait for the debate of yesterday or to anticipate the discussion of to-day to know the reception which this clause was almost bound to receive. He was very glad, notwithstanding the coldness of the reception of this clause, that the Government, with one accord and without any difference of opinion whatsoever, adhered to it, stuck to it, and treated it as a just though highly exceptional clause. He did not complain of hon. Gentlemen opposite because they did not receive this clause with gratitude or enthusiasm. Why should they? They took the denominational line; they said they would like all the schools to be denominational; they would put not only Rome but Lambeth on the rates, Lord Halifax on the rates, and Lady Wimborne and Dr. Clifford on the rates. Baptists, Wesleyans, Quakers, everybody should be upon the rates, and therefore it was not unnatural that they looked askance upon a clause which he agreed did not by any means secure them the complete enjoyment of rate-aid for all their schools. How many it would secure nobody could tell, because that depended upon the four-fifths calculation which still remained to be taken. It did undoubtedly secure the Roman Catholics and the Jews—the Jews, he thought, of all their schools and the Roman Catholics of a very considerable number; while to the Anglicans there could be no doubt whatsoever that this clause, as it stood originally and as now amended, would give a considerable amount of denominational support and secure them rate-aid for denominational schools. About that there could be no doubt whatsoever. On the question of "may" or "shall," those who were in charge of the Bill had to consider how it would work supposing the Amendment were carried. "Shall" by itself would, in the first instance, put a statutory obligation on the local authority to adopt a particular course of action, and non-fulfilment would bring them before the Court of King's Bench. Now, what would the Court of King's Bench have to do in order to consider the question, aye or no, whether it should issue its mandamus or not? The Court would require to have presented to it a clear-cut issue of a refusal by a local authority to discharge a plain and simple statutory duty. The Court would have to consider, in the first place, whether the conditions of Clause 4 had been scrupulously and properly fulfilled. It would have to ascertain whether the wishes of four-fifths of the parents had been ascertained by ballot. It would have to consider, also, what was the state of school accommodation in the area in order to satisfy itself whether or not there was sufficient and suitable accommodation for the children whose parents did not desire those facilities. These were not legal questions, they were not questions which the Court had the means of ascertaining, nor had it in any way the machinery to enable it to determine such questions. And before it could issue its mandamus it would have to settle or see settled the arrangement between the local authority and the owners of the school of which the extended facilities were one of the terms and conditions. It could not take it upon itself. It would have to say to the local authority, "You must come to some agreement with these people to give them extended facilities." No mandamus would issue in the first instance at all, because the Court had not the means of making the authority and the school come to their agreement relating to the circumstances of the facilities, how they were to be granted, on what terms and conditions, and how the school was to be taken over, subject to those conditions. In other words, the Court could not grant specific performance of an agreement containing a great number of arrangements and conditions unless that agreement had been come to. So far from the Amendment facilitating the end in view, it would render the grant of a mandamus practically impossible, because they never would be able to present before the Court a clear-cut issue as to the particular statutory duty which the local authority had failed to perform. On the other hand, under the proposals of the Government—and they had carefully thought them out—they had arrived at the conclusion that in order to make the clause workable in as many cases as possible the appeal to the Board of Education was by far the better and more suitable way in the interests of all parties concerned. The Board of Education was an administrative educational body, and it already knew the circumstances of the case, so far, at all events, as the school accommodation of the area was concerned. It was in close and constant weekly touch with those authorities. It knew the men, their temper and character, the dangers that had to be avoided, and the difficulties in the way. It also had its army of inspectors, well acquainted with the personnel of the localities. The Government by the Amendment enabled the Board of Education, in the event of no agreement being come to, in the first instance to determine what that agreement should be in all its details, and among them the condition for extended facilities. They therefore had created—what the Amendment did not do—a machinery which enabled an arrangement to be made between the authority and the school, which arrangement could be in all its terms and details forced on the local education authority, if need be, by mandamus. Nothing would be more likely to make this clause a sham than if they were to substitute the language of the Amendment for that of the Government. He therefore asked the Committee most carefully to consider whether the interposition of the Board of Education as the great administrative body already connected by very close ties with the local authorities of the country was not far more likely to effect a peaceful settlement of disputes, and bring about a binding, complete and clear-cut arrangement. He contended that the Government plan was a fair and reasonable and practical plan, and would give effect to the clause in the best possible way, whereas the Amendment before the Committee would entirely fail to carry out the wishes and desires of hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the Committee, who, he thought, had given it somewhat hasty support. It had been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's, Hanover Square, that the mere fact that the Board of Education would have an alternative, that it did not allow itself in special circumstances, if so minded, to substitute for the mandamus this standing out of a school, took the whole sting out of the mandamus altogether. The right hon. Gentleman trotted out the saying about the line of least resistance which seemed now to be the Alpha and the Omega of modern statesmanship. He understood that that was applicable to all Parties and to all purposes. The right hon. Gentleman said that the statesman or the politician, if he could pursue the line of least resistance, if he had to find a way out of a difficulty, if he could go round any dark corner, would do it rather than exercise the powers the law had conferred upon him. All he could say was that the bias of the Board of Education—whoever was in the position of its President or permanent Secretary—would always be against resorting to allowing a school to stand out in any form or shape if they could by any possibility avoid it. The Board of Education would always regard with intense dislike and ill-concealed hatred anything which would remove from the national system—from the national obligation of support, both in the form of Parliamentary grants and rates, any school in the country where children received their education. Therefore, if the idea was that the Board of Education would be astute or eager to avoid its statutory power to resort to a mandamus, and instead of that to seek to force a school to go out and suffer all the evil consequences that flowed from standing out, it was, he was sure, an abuse of imagination. It would be the exact opposite. The Board of Education would strive its utmost and see to it that no local authority, even if it was so disposed—a thing which he did not like even to contemplate—should disobey or defy the law as defined by Parliament. The one desire of the Board of Education would be to force it to obey the law, and it would be only in special circumstances that they would resort, and that with extreme reluctance and unwillingness, to this other alternative, which was inserted only out of abundant caution, in the passionate hope and desire that, whatever happened, even in the remotest parts of the country, as little damage as possible should be done to these particular schools under this clause. The Amendment he would propose said that—

> "if under any special circumstances of the case the Board think it expedient they may instead of making such an arrangement make an order allowing the school to continue as a State-aided school."

In those special circumstances would, of course, be included the pecuniary circumstances of the school, its income, its endowments, its capacity for obtaining subscriptions enabling it to fill the disagreeable gap between the money which it received from Parliament and the money which was necessary in order to keep it on a good and sufficient scale. These would be among the special circumstances which were contemplated, which the clause intended should be contemplated, by this particular language. Therefore, in the case of a school where it was obvious that if it was driven to stand out it would be in a parlous case owing to its poverty, to its locality, or to other circumstances, then, indeed, that would be additional reason which would urge, almost compel, the Board of Education to rely on its statutory powers. He did really put it to the Committee quite frankly and seriously that they were under a mistake if they believed that the simple deletion of the word "may" and the substitution for it of the word "shall," would get them out of the difficulties which they imagined were before these schools. The machinery of the Government, elaborate as it was, had been devised and carefully thought out for no other purpose whatever than that of making these facilities as real as they possibly could be and of securing to the Board of Education the power of giving effect to them. He, therefore, did think from that point of view, that the Committee ought soon to be in a position to make up its mind, and he besought hon. Members who sat behind the Government to give this matter their careful consideration and to come to the conclusion that the scheme of the Government was more likely to make the clause what it was intended to be than the alternative of substituting one word for another.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford) said the right hon. Gentleman at the commencement of his speech spoke more than once of the cold reception which Clause 4 had received from those in whose interest it was proposed, and he spoke not only of cold words being addressed to him but of abuse.

MR. BIRRELL : Not in this House.

MR. JOHN REDMOND thought he could only say on behalf of those for whom he spoke that the right hon. Gentleman had received no abuse from them. They had no complaint to make to the right hon. Gentleman except that they believed that he was not able to carry out in practice the views which they believed he held. The right hon. Gentleman had more than once declared himself as a friend of denominational teaching in the schools, and their sole complaint was that he had not been able in the clause before them to give what they believed to be adequate effect to the views he held. The course the discussion had taken and the development of the new Government proposals had caused him and his colleagues most acute pain and misgiving. They had arrived at what was for them the kernel of the whole situation. Clause 4 was to be their charter. It depended on Clause 4 whether this Bill was to be tolerable for the Catholic schools, and whether the religious convictions of the parents who sent their children to these schools would be safeguarded, or whether, on the other hand that clause was to be regarded by them as an instrument of injustice and of religious tyranny in the hands of a dominant majority. Personally he had from the first been filled with the belief and hope that Clause 4 would be so altered as to fulfil the object for which it had been introduced. Notwithstanding all that had happened he did not yet abandon the hope which he had entertained, because of the necessities of the case. The right hon. Gentleman said this was an undenominational Bill. In one sense that might be true. But let it never be forgotten that the House, by an overwhelming majority, had declared against secular education and had decided in favour of giving religious education in the schools. If religious education was to be given, then manifestly and necessarily if the Bill was not to become an instrument of religious tyranny they must take care that the religious education which was given was not such as to be abhorrent to the religious convictions of the children and their parents. The House had decided that the religious teaching in normal schools was to be what was known as Cowper-Templeism, and he desired again to emphasise the position he took up on the Second Reading of the Bill, that Cowper-Temple teaching presented itself to Catholics in an entirely different way from the way it presented itself to Protestants of any section. He would not repeat the mistake of saying that it was satisfactory to all Protestants, but he would say that that system, if it was not agreeable and satisfactory to all sections of Protestants, was not offensive to the religious convictions of any section of Protestants. Catholics stood in an entirely different position. They regarded that kind of religious teaching as the teaching of Protestantism. They might be quite wrong, but it was not a question of whether they were right or wrong. It was a question of whether they believed it or not, and if they believed that this system of teaching was in reality Protestantism, and therefore hostile to their religion, then they said, and he said, that the House having decided that they would not have secular education, that they would have religious education, and that the normal religious education should be Cowper-Templeism, which was offensive to Catholics, they were bound, if they did not wish to turn the Bill into an engine of religious tyranny to Catholics, to provide that in the Catholic schools the religion taught should be such as would be consonant with the religious convictions and opinions of Catholics. He recognised most fully that this clause was intended to meet their case. He did not impugn the motive of the right hon. Gentleman in the least. He believed this clause was honestly intended to meet their case, and he confessed that he could not believe under these circumstances that either the Government or the House would attempt to palm off upon Catholics a clause which manifestly was insufficient for the purpose for which it was intended. For this belief they had good authority. He did not think the debate on this clause ought to be allowed to conclude without again having quoted to the House the words of the Minister for Education when addressing the Jews. These words had been quoted again and again, but now was the time to quote them, for this was the clause to which they were specially applicable and upon which they were entitled to call them in evidence. The right hon. Gentleman pledged himself in that famous speech that he would not allow Clause 4 to be illusory or a fraud, and that, he was sure, was the intention of the majority behind him. His business was to impress upon the Government and their supporters, if he could, the belief which he entertained, and which he was sure they would admit he honestly entertained, that the clause, if it was not changed in certain particulars, would be illusory and a fraud. The right hon. Gentleman had deprecated leaving any foothold for pig-headed obstinacy on the part of any local authority. He said it was the intention of the framers of the Bill that it should be obligatory on the local authority to provide facilities if four-fifths of the parents desired them. He then went on to say that the teachers should remain the same as they were—those who alone were qualified to give the particular religious instruction which hitherto had been given in the schools. The Nationalist Party all the more readily believed in the honest intention of the right hon. Gentleman and the Government to give effect in the Bill to these public pledges, because they were anxious if they could to support the Bill. They recognised fully that grave injustice was done, in one particular at any rate, to the Nonconformists of England by the Act of 1902, and they were anxious, without the destruction of the interests of their own religion and of their schools, to join the Nonconformists in lifting the injustice off their shoulders. They did not desire to separate their schools from the general system of national education in the country. They desired their schools to be sanitary, efficient, and well-equipped schools, with efficient and well-paid teachers, and they believed that in the interests of the efficiency of their schools it would be a mistake to separate themselves from the general system of education. All that was necessary to make the fourth clause acceptable to them was that it should be made obligatory on the local authorities, so that there should be no loophole for evasion by any pig-headed bodies. They asked in addition that the voice of the parents should be heard in the selection of the teachers, and they asked for a qualification in the limits of 5,000 and four-fifths which would enable the bulk of the Roman Catholic schools to come in under the provisions of the Act. It had been said that the bulk of the Roman Catholic schools would come in under Clause 4. There were 1,040 such schools, and 501 would be excluded from all benefit under that clause by the double operation of the 5,000 limit and the four-fifths. With regard to the question of making the clause mandatory, he said they did not distrust the elected public bodies. For his part he believed there would be as much broadmindedness and toleration to be found amongst those bodies in this country as in any country in Europe. But of course there might possibly be a few who would refuse to put the clause into operation if it were left to local option. It would be a ridiculous result of all the labours and sacrifices of this Parliament in passing this great measure if any obscure and unimportant body here and there throughout the country should have the power resting in its hands to defy the decision of the House and refuse to carry out the intentions of the Act. Parliament had decided that there should be religious teachers in the schools. It had decided that in certain schools where the children were nearly all of one creed that creed should be taught. It had laid down these great provisions with fairness and justice; but would it be wise to allow the local authorities to trample on these provisions?

MR. BYLES (Salford, N.) said he did not want unduly to interrupt the hon. and learned gentleman's argument, but he asked, for his own information, if this clause was made mandatory, how did he know that the local authorities would not be recalcitrant?
